Those who have studied their religious beliefs find much that is admirable even when compared with the best the world has known, and no people has surpassed him in his fanciful individualization of the forces of nature. There is nothing more poetic than the stories of the origin of all the flowers he knew. Each one as told to his children is a gem of literature. All of these beliefs and fancies played a wonderful part in his life and their influence is shown in the acting of the pagan Indians Mr. Moore has employed in picturing their great Passion Play, Hiawatha.

A LUCKY CHANCE (Mar. 11).—Tom Winters, an employee of the Navo Mining Company, is in love with Helen Morton, and his love is returned. Helen's father, however, who is a wealthy ranchman, does not look with favor on Tom's suit, as he wants his daughter to marry a wealthy man. As a means of ending the romance, Mr. Morton uses his influence with the manager of the Navo Mining Company to have Tom discharged. Tom resents the injustice and threatens to "get even." On the night of Tom's dismissal he finds himself with only a few dollars and decides to try and better his finances at the gaming table. While in the gambling house Tom loses the notebook in which he had written the combination of the mining company's safe and it is found by Pedro, a Mexican, who is one of the band of guerrillas under the leadership of Pasquale, a Mexican bandit. That night the Mexicans break open the safe and when the robbery is discovered on the following day Tom is arrested and accused of the crime. Helen goes out for a bicycle ride, accompanied by her dog, and as she is passing a ravine she comes upon the Mexicans' rendezvous and discovers them counting their ill-gotten gains. She hurriedly writes a note and, after entrusting it to the dog, she proceeds to hold up the Mexicans until help arrives. The dog returns with the note and Tom and the sheriff ride to the aid of Helen. The Mexicans are captured and it is then discovered that the weapon with which Helen held the bandits at bay was nothing more than a bicycle wrench which she had taken from the tool bag on the wheel. It is needless to add that Mr. Morton now consents to the marriage of Tom and Helen, as he must repay the wrong he did the young mining clerk.

WHEN JOHN BROUGHT HOME HIS WIFE (Mar. 13).—John Robins is a young farmer with a deep yearning for the city and a distaste for everything that savors of his country existence. He shocks his parents with his "advanced" ideas when he tells them he is going to the city to make a fortune and to see life. They protest, but seeing no other way out of it allow him to go. John stops at a theatrical boarding house in the city, and the taunts and scorn of the theatre folks over the newly-arrived boob only inflames his resentment at his country antecedents. Helen Phalen, a chorus girl, takes his side and does her best to make him forget his country awkwardness, and in his appreciation of her efforts John falls in love with her. They both look for work; John happy to get anything that will give a start toward the fortune he is after, and Helen anxious for a place with the chorus of any one of the new shows. Both fail utterly and soon come to the end of their resources. John, in his desperate discouragement, looks at his last dollar and, figuring life as a failure, concludes to pack up and go home and admit that he is a failure. Helen enters her room at the same time and throws herself down in a storm of despairing sobs. He comforts her and then a daring idea occurs to him to change their luck by using their last dollar to get married. She agrees, and they become the happiest of creatures until they get back from the minister's and face the reality of their troubles again. But luck has changed in the form of a letter from his mother enclosing him money and telling him they are getting old and need him. Helen discards all her theatrical clothes, cosmetics, etc., and with their few plain clothes packed in the old carpet bag they go back to the farm, where the old folks receive them with open arms.

HIS GRANDCHILD (March 11).—The Captain and the Colonel have been life-long comrades until a dispute over a game of chess disrupts their friendship, an incident that proves rather serious to the Colonel's son, for he is in love with the Captain's daughter. But, love is indomitable. The young couple are secretly married, but when they seek for her father's approval he refuses, and even disowns his daughter.

Several years later, while sitting by the fireside with memories of the past still haunting his mind, the Captain is very much surprised to receive a letter from his little grandson, wishing him a happy birthday. He shows the letter to the old housekeeper, who secretly sends the young people an invitation to a birthday dinner. The next day, the child, accompanied by his parents, appears at the appointed hour. The father and mother stand hesitatingly at the door while the little fellow boldly approaches the old man, exclaiming, "Hello, grandpa, we have come to your birthday party." Although angry at first, the simple innocence of the child goes straight to his stony old heart. He takes his little grandson in his arms and when the parents approach, welcomes all three of them in one big embrace.

URBAN ECLIPSE—George Kleine

THE LOST WAGER (Mar. 12).—The wealthy Count Lester becomes dissatisfied with the luxury and ease of his everyday life. To create a little excitement at his club he makes a wager of $10,000 with his friend Ferris that he can live a month as a roustabout without spending a penny that he does not earn. Dressed in his old clothes, the Count goes upon the street and eagerly accepts the odd jobs that are offered, such as carrying trunks, unloading coal and selling newspapers.

On the last evening of his allotted time he goes to spend the night at the municipal lodging house, but who should he meet there but his old friend Ferris? When the latter, explaining that he is down and out, appeals for aid, Count Lester gladly hands him a check for $1,000. Ferris, who has been deceiving, immediately claims that the Count has lost the bet, for he has spent money that he did not earn.

The two men return to the club where the Count is forced to confess that he has lost the bet, but complacently announces that he has gained some things more valuable to him—health and happiness.

JAN VEDDER'S DAUGHTER (Mar. 11).—The story of a young girl's great love for an English officer during the time when "old New York was Dutch." Good old Jan Vedder has set his mind on having for a son-in-law the good-for-nothing Nick, the town lounger.

The fancy Vedder has taken for Nick cannot be overcome by his daughter, Katrina, and the minute she shows signs of caring for an English officer he becomes more determined than ever that she shall marry Nick.

First we see Nick calling on old Jan and, when Katrina enters the room, trying to kiss her. For this he receives a sound slap and Katrina rushes from the room in anger. On her return Jan and Nick having gone out, her anger soon turns to smiles as she sees her British sweetheart, through the window, coming to make an afternoon call. So intent is their lovemoking that they do not hear Vedder return. Seeing the much-hated British cap he not only throws it out the door but orders the lover from the house.

A few evenings later after Nick has been to call on the old man, Vedder enters his house to behold his daughter waving to the officer. The old Dutchman is completely upset and, getting his blunderbuss, he fires, but his aim is bad and the Britisher, who had anticipated his act, had hidden in the bushes and was in nowise injured. The father decides that Katrina must marry at once; Nick is notified and the time is set.

The officer, learning of the coming weeding, is at a loss what to do, but "love finds a way." He goes to a tavern for his ale and there discovers the bridegroom in an awful state of intoxication, asleep. With a little more ale he induces him to change clothes with him and all looks better. At the pastor's he is mistaken for Nick by the near-sighted Vedder, and the wedding proceeds. All goes well until Nick appears on the scene accompanied by an officer, who has arrested him for his drunken condition while wearing the British uniform. When Vedder sees the real situation he goes into an awful temper but finally realizes it is all for the best and the couple are forgiven.

AUNT ELSA'S VISIT (Mar. 12).—Whenever we hear the title of "old maid" we at once photograph her in our minds as a lean, austere, crabbed finicky being. In the Moore family Aunt Elsa, the old maid sister of Mr. Moore, writes she is going to pay them a visit. The Moores are without a cook, and the day the aunt is to arrive there is a party on hand. The house is at sixes and sevens.

Bobby, the twelve-year-old boy, much to his disgust, is commissioned to meet her at the railway station. His father gives him a dollar and a half for lunches and carfares and his mother and sisters tell him to keep aunty out all day.

Aunt Elsa is met by her young nephew and his eyes are opened in astonishment, for he does not find a typical old maid aunt but a middle-aged woman full of life and spirit. She refuses to ride in street cars and calls a taxi. She gives Bobby the time of his life and, upon reaching home, impersonates the new cook.

On the same reel:

A MODERN HORSE.—The task of removing tree stumps and undergrowth of all kinds from the land which is to be occupied by the immense Ashokan Reservoir is of such magnitude that it cannot be realized or imagined by the average person in the everyday walks of life.

For the speedy and efficient accomplishment of this work the contractors have brought to their aid some of the most modern and interesting traction engines obtainable, and in this picture we show one of these monster machines in some remarkable feats. The engine carries its own tracks in the form of an endless chain attached to the wheels, which enables it to travel over any kind of ground, whether hilly, sandy or marshy, with the utmost ease. The tree stumps, etc., to be removed are attached to the engine by a long steel wire cable and when the engine is started we see them literally dragged out by the roots leaving only a jagged hole to mark the place where these monarchs of the forest once grew.

We also see the machine used for plowing, drawing from twelve to eighteen plows at one time and turning immense furrows which would require the use of forty to fifty horses and fifteen to twenty men to accomplish the same work.

A close view shows the machine in the details of its construction and how it is loaded for transportation by its own power crossing an open space of three feet between railroad platforms and flat car.

We consider ourselves fortunate in securing this highly interesting and instructive picture for our patrons.

A YOUTHFUL KNIGHT (Mar. 14).—Tom is a boisterous boy who brings his playground manners into his mother's parlor. His mother, knowing that he is a gentleman at heart, tries to improve his behavior generally, more by suggestion and example than by reproving him, and her efforts eventually meet with success, but it is a long, uphill fight for both of them. She reads to him of the Knights of the Round Table, of Sir Galahad and the Holy Grail, and fills him with an idea of chivalry, gallantry and courtesy. She buys him a suit of toy armor and a sword and draws up rules of truth and honor for him to sign.

The boy, filled with enthusiasm, selects for his special favors a little, spoiled girl who does not understand. Of all acts of gallantry one of Sir Walter Raleigh appeals most to him. He takes advantage of an opportunity and spreads his coat for Ethel to tread upon. She laughs at him, stamps upon the coat and makes faces at him. Later he is very much discouraged and although he rescues her from the consequence of her own fault she denounces him as being the one to blame.

He is in disgrace and his armor and his knighthood are taken away from him. All that his mother has told him of the reward for strict rectitude must be true because it was his mother who told him, but his faith has received a severe shock and is in danger of being lost altogether, but the spoiled girl, in her childish way, begins to understand and she decides to tell the truth.

Tom gets back his honors and his knighthood and the seed so lovingly and carefully sown by the mother begins to take root and gives promise of bearing fruit.

At the close of the story one has a complete belief that this boy and girl will grow into a noble man and woman, helping others by their example.

WHEN A WOMAN WON'T (Mar. 17).—Ed and George loved Betsy, but Betsy was a flirt. What more natural then, that Betsy should give to each a locket containing her picture and inform each of her unswerving love and devotion. But Betsy wouldn't marry a common village boy and they both set out therefore together, to make their fortunes and win the coquettish Betsy.

Mining together, the boys accidentally came across each other's locket and there was trouble immediately. They took a few potshots at each other by way of showing their faith in the flirtative Betsy. And, could they have been suddenly transported to their home town just then, they would have seen Betsy pledging herself forevermore to quite another chap.

Anyhow, a stray bullet uncovered a vein of gold. Also, it brought a natural cessation in hostilities, for gold veins are too rare to be thus ignored even where love is concerned. So they agree to divide the spoils of their claim and put the matter squarely before Betsy.

They returned and inquired the whereabouts of Betsy. A good-natured villager pointed her out, hanging fast to the arm of her recent husband. Beholding this sad blighting of their fondest hopes, Ed and George, who had a genuine fondness for each other, looked each other in the eye, shook hands, and decided then and there to lavish their joint wealth on two separate and distinct girls whom kind Dame Fortune, in good time, would see fit to send to them.

THE LESSON (Mar. 20).—Ed Williams and Bessie Thompson were country sweethearts. One day an automobile stopped and a handsome city man alighted, asking a drink of water. He was charmed at the sight of the fresh country beauty of Bessie and took board with her father.

The days passed and Bessie grew to love the handsome stranger. But one day a letter came and the stranger, after reading it, with a muttered exclamation, slipped it into his pocket. From there it fell to the ground, and Bessie picked it up. It read: "My dear Herbert: Sorry to disturb your vacation, but you should be present at the Courcy reception for business reasons. Your wife, Jeanette."

Bessie, with the knowledge of this man's perfidy, found it easy to turn with more love toward the country sweetheart she had spurned for him.

AN EASTERN FLOWER (Mar. 22).— Harmonica Jack was not only foreman but a popular man as well. Phyllis, the ranch girl, loved him, but to her Jack was merely pleasant.

One day an Eastern girl came to see her friend Phyllis. The inevitable happened—Jack and the Eastern girl fell violently in love. Phyllis suffered cruelly in silence.

A good-for-nothing Greaser also sees and desires the beautiful Eastern girl. He plans to kidnap her, but Phyllis overhears. Torn between her desire to see Jack and her friend irretrievably separated and her plain duty, Phyllis decides for the latter. She informs of the plot and the Greaser is brought to justice.

THANHOUSER

JUST A SHABBY DOLL (Mar. 11).—The little girl tripped into the library one evening "to kiss papa good night." She found him with a doll in his hands, a shabby, disreputable toy, which had never been of any great intrinsic value. It puzzled the little girl, and she asked questions. The father was in a reminiscent mood that evening, so he took his little daughter on his knee and told her the wonderful history of the shabby doll.

It seems that years before a friendless little newsboy met a little girl who was beautiful and kind and rich. The boy was able to do some favors for the little girl, and she was so kindly in her appreciation of them that the boy decided nothing was too good for her. Therefore at Christmastime he wasted an extraordinary amount of money, he thinks now it was twenty cents, in the purchase of a doll, which seemed to him to be a thing of beauty.

Well, the years passed, and the ragged newsboy grew up to be a fine, manly youth while the little girl developed into a beautiful woman. They loved each other, but the girl's father pointed out that the young man did not have sufficient funds to support the girl in the station of life to which she was accustomed. The young man went West to make a fortune, and at first had many trials and suffered long from illness. When he made the fortune and came East with it the girl he loved had disappeared. He learned that her father had lost all his money and that the girl had wandered out into the world to earn her own living, but he did not know where she was. Then one day, while a guest at a house party, a child displayed the doll she had taken from the trunk of her governess, and the governess came in to reclaim it, and the boy recognized the girl he had sought and everyone rejoiced and the marriage bells rang soon afterwards.

The little girl who heard the story rejoiced when she found that her parents were the principals in it, and vowed she would cherish "the shabby doll" as long as she lived.

THE IDOL OF THE HOUR (Mar. 14).—The young artist had searched Paris for a suitable model to pose as a shepherdess in a new picture which he hoped would win him fame. But none of the models pleased him, and at last, feeling that he could not do justice to the picture, he decided to postpone his work and take a walking trip through France.

In a little hamlet far removed from the cities the artist found the model for his picture, a beautiful peasant girl, tending her sheep on the hillside. He tried to induce her to return with him to Paris, but she demurred, and he went back to Paris alone. But the girl thought often of the stories he had told her of the wonders of the French capital, and the simple country life palled upon her, until one day she left her country home forever and journeyed to the great city. The artist received her joyfully. She was a great success as a model and the painting made the artist famous.

As time passed the liking that the girl had for the artist grew into love, but it was not reciprocated, for to the man she was merely a beautiful model; that, and nothing more. The model was the idol of Paris, but although many of her admirers were far richer than the artist, she cared only for him. The artist gave his love to another woman and married her.

When models cease to be young they are no longer in demand, and this the former shepherdess learned all too soon. Slowly she sank in the social scale until at last she was glad to earn her living as a cleaner in office buildings.

One day the woman, now old, was sent into a studio building to scrub the floors. She entered a studio and commenced her work. A man sitting at an easel, painting, turned as she entered, then, seeing that it was only the scrubwoman, continued his work. But the woman stood aghast, her heart struggling with conflicting emotions. For the artist was the man whose reputation she had made, and whom she had loved in the years gone by. Her heart filled with yearning, she stretched out her arms to him as he sat busily working at his painting; then as a realization of her position came to her, she picked up mop and pail and staggered out of the studio and his life forever.

BUSINESS MUST NOT INTERFERE (Mar. 23).—This second of the wonderful Newlywed series, showing our old friend Snookums in his very humorous adventures is another hearty laugh from start to finish.

This time the trouble is with him and the telephone, and his father has a real struggle to satisfy him.

Snookums has a drum and father wants to telephone, but since Snookums believes in having a good time, and having a good time with him, at that present minute, means getting all the noise possible out of his drum, father has his troubles in trying to use the 'phone.

The way father rushes around in order to figure out how he is going to keep baby pleased and still be able to use the 'phone gives ample opportunity for many, many laughs.

The fathers who have children at home can certainly appreciate the point of this clever little cartoon. Although the Newlywed pictures have been very popular as "still" cartoons, they have proved a hundred times more popular when shown on the screen in this animated form.

The reception which this series has met with has shown that it will be easily the biggest comedy success of the year.

On the same reel:

THE DYTISCUS.—On the same reel with this second of the wonderful Newlywed series will be found a scientific subject of great educational interest. The Dytiscus is a species of water beetle and they are abundant in stagnant water.

The pictures give an unusually accurate idea of the development of this carnivorous insect. These scientific subjects are difficult to make, and this particular film shows very clearly how much patience is necessary to get such a subject perfect. This bit of work contains a struggle between a Tripon which has been caught in the jaws of the Dytiscus, for which the camera man had to wait a number of days before the exact positions desired could be secured.

It is most interesting to see the possibility of the camera as used in scientific studies, and the subject is a gem as an educational.

WAS SHE TO BLAME? (Mar. 20).—Jack Gorman, a laborer and an abusive, hard drinking man, treats his more refined wife as a drudge. Mary stands it until she sees an advertisement asking for a companion to an invalid girl. The temptation for something better is strong. She steals away and applies for and gets the position.

The invalid, Nell, is sister to the Reverend Charles Spencer, and Mary is soon happy again. Jack Gorman goes to Arizona and is very badly injured in a mine explosion. He is reported dead and Mary reads an account of the fatal accident in a newspaper. She nearly faints, but foolishly fails to tell her sympathetic friends the cause. Jack is taken to a Los Angeles hospital and eventually recovers.

Poor Nell goes to her Maker, and Mary prepares to leave, but Spencer loves her and tells her she must be his wife. Mary tells him that he knows nothing of her past. He answers that he does not care, he looks to her future. Jack reads the notice of the marriage and calls upon the minister, begging for help. Spencer gives him money and advice, and Mary sees the man she thought dead in a looking glass as he is leaving the house. She is terrified and in despair.

The following day Jack gains admittance to Mary. He endeavors to be familiar, but she repels him. He demands money. Spencer returns to the house unexpectedly and overhears the demand of the man and the protests of his wife. He interferes and the truth is told. Gorman tells the minister he wants money and not the woman, and Spencer, throwing off his coat, beats the brute and sends him away.

The following day Spencer and Mary agree that there is but one thing to do. Mary must return to Jack and try to affect a reformation. Jack has climbed to the small balcony and overhears. The balcony gives way, he falls and is killed. Spencer and Mary agree to bury the past.

KATHLEEN MAVOURNEEN (Three Reel) (Mar. 17).—Kathleen was the belle of all the fairs and the pride of all of the peasants' merrymakings. Beautiful and capricious, she was loved by all, and particularly by Terence O'Moore, a poor young peasant, and Squire Kavanaugh, the wealthy and high-born landlord. Kathleen really loved Terence, but her pretty little head was turned by the ardent wooing of the cultured squire, and poor Terence's heart was almost bursting. Finally the squire formally proposed and was told by her to call in the morning for his answer. Poor Terence heard this and went away crushed with sorrow, and if tears had been poison there would not have been a blade of live green grass on Glenna Hill that night. Soon after the squire secretly married Kathleen and brought her home to the castle. Her happiness was short lived for he soon scorned his lowly-born wife and she bitterly repented her marriage, when he told her that she was not his wife and that the marriage was a mockery, for a clever scoundrel had masqueraded as the priest. This was soon disproved and the truth told, for the broken-hearted girl hastened to the parish priest, who soon set her mind at rest. He told her and Bernard that he had been called to the deathbed of the criminal who had been hired by Bernard to impersonate a priest to entrap Kathleen into a false marriage, and the repentant man, who was near death, had told him all. The priest performed the marriage ceremony and the scoundrelly Bernard never suspected but what the genuine priest was the rascal he had employed. Bernard hypocritically made the best of this astounding information and induced the innocent Kathleen to return home with him and soon lulled her into a false sense of happiness, but her faithless husband was plotting to rid himself of what he considered a clog upon his pleasures and his prospects and hired three ruffians to do away with her. The plans were complete and Bernard induced her to go upon a moonlight ride with him, and when near the rocky glen in which the assassins were waiting he left her upon the pretext of seeking a smoother road, and the ruffians seized her and she was only rescued from death by the appearance of Terence, who fell upon the ruffians with such ferocity that he threw two of them over the cliff and put the other to flight. Bernard rushed on and attacked him and was accidentally killed in the scuffle. Some soldiers who had been attracted by the noise ran in and Terence was placed under arrest after Bernard had accused him of murdering him.

After a trial Terence is about to be executed and is led to the gallows after a tearful farewell from Kathleen and the good old priest. Heartbroken Kathleen almost faints when she sees the honest youth ascend the scaffold.

Then she wakes up and, behold, it is all a dream.

Bernard comes for his answer and is speedily dismissed, and she rushes to Terence's arms. They have the merriest wedding the old had ever seen, and all dancing and poteen drinking records were totally eclipsed.

NESTOR

HER FRIEND, THE BAD MAN (Mar. 19).—Not having time to take their gold to town and knowing it would be unsafe to take it with him, John bids his wife, Mary, and their little girl, Marie, goodbye, and leaves the gold with her. But he is not far away before two desperadoes, Bill and Jim, who have seen, through the window, Mary put the bag away, enter and ask her for food, and while she is waiting on one the other slips into her room and secures the treasure, and although Mary holds them up with her rifle, they manage to get Marie between them and Mary. With her as a shield they make their escape, not until she has called for help, however, and attracted the attention of the two-gun man, Sid, who has previously stopped at the place for water after eluding the sheriff. As he turns to answer her cry from where he has been watching the movements of the sheriff in the valley below, Bill and Jim make off with their horses. Firing, he wounds Bill, who is carrying the gold, and he falls from the horse. Sid takes the gold as a recompense for the horse. Delighted at his bargain he hurries on to avoid the sheriff, who rides on and takes Bill into custody and later captures Jim. Marie, in the meanwhile, has run out to secure help for her mother. The child becomes confused and finally lost, so instead of reaching their neighbors she finds herself in the desert. Sid also makes for the desert, and it is the outlaw who rescues the little girl and brings her safely home to learn that the gold belongs to Mary and to be taken into custody by the sheriff, but John, who has just returned, declared he would use his influence to have Sid released and give him a fresh start in life.

AMBROSIO

MARITZA (Mar 8).—In the harem of Mohamed Pasha, one of the most influential of the young Turks, Maritza, a young and beautiful Christian girl from Macedonia, is held captive.

One day, by chance, she sees Captain Nicholas Joutcheff of the Bulgarian Legation, who has been sent to deliver into the Pasha's hands a diplomatic protest concerning the freedom of Macedonia. Admiration between these two young people soon ripens into love. A secret meeting is arranged in which they plight their troth. War is declared and Joutcheff leaves Constantinople to join his regiment. Maritza also leaves the capital and, as a nurse, cares for the wounded Turkish soldiers.

During an encounter Joutcheff is captured and taken prisoner by Mohamed Pasha, who offers him his liberty if he will reveal the secrets of the Bulgarian position. This he promptly refuses to do and is ordered by the Pasha to be shot at sunrise.

Maritza, hearing of the fate of her lover, though filled with grief, immediately devises a plan to liberate him. As she has now become head nurse, and having won the Pasha's favor by her sweet smile and acquiescence to his caresses, she has little trouble in obtaining the use of his motor car on the pretense of carrying supplies from the strong room to the hospital. From the strong room she then takes enough gold to bribe the soldier who is guarding her lover. After some hesitation the guard is persuaded to accept the gold and extract the cartridges that are to be used at the execution of Joutcheff. He also delivers the message in which Maritza informs Joutcheff of her plan.

Joutcheff plays his part so cleverly, falling at the first volley, that the soldiers, thinking him dead, leave him. Maritza quickly joins him and jumping into the Pasha's car they soon leave the city behind. All goes well until the car is damaged beyond repair and they are compelled to complete the journey on foot. Suddenly they are confronted by a body of Turkish soldiers who have been sent to capture them and, seeing their escape cut off and their ruse discovered, they decide to fight until the end rather than surrender, as there is still a hope of escape, for they are near the Bulgarian outposts.

Snatching a gun from a dead soldier, Joutcheff opens fire on his pursuers and continues to shoot until he is wounded. Maritza, taking the gun from him, uses their last cartridge, when in the distance she sees the Bulgarian troops approaching. She runs forward, but the troops have arrived too late. On her return she finds her lover dead, and at the same time she receives a fatal wound and dies on her lover's breast.

THE CRITIC (March 15).—Henry Roberts, a theatrical critic on the Daily Record, one of the largest and most influential newspapers in the country, is a man wholly without principle, using the power his position gives him to further his own interests.

One of the persons powerless to combat with his influence, is Helene, a beautiful actress entering upon her career, and whose ambition causes her to endure his attentions, she being aware that he can ruin her career if he so wishes.

While attending a reception one evening, she meets Oscar Payne, a rising young poet of great promise, but who is of a reticent disposition and tries to avoid public attention. He is asked to read some of his poems, but consents only at the request of his mother, whom he idolizes, and the persuasion of his old teacher, Louis Miles. This gentleman had once been a great dramatist, but at the present time is in so greatly reduced circumstances that he is forced to appeal to Roberts, the critic, for financial aid, which is promptly refused.

Roberts' jealousy being aroused by the rising fame of the young poet and his attentions to the actress, makes frequent and unjust attacks on the character and poems of his rival, through his influence in the press. The crisis is reached when both men meet at Helene's apartment and a violent quarrel is avoided only by the promise of the young girl to give her hand to the one writing the best comedy, she being confident that Payne will be successful.

Payne soon finishes his comedy and, with the assistance of Helene, is enabled to read it for approval to the editors of the paper on which Roberts is critic. The play is highly commended.

Roberts, however, is unable even to start his comedy and, as a last resort, seeks the aid of the old dramatist. Ignorant of the fact that Louis Miles is Payne's old teacher and friend, he asks him to write his comedy for him. This the dramatist refuses to do and immediately informs Payne of the plot.

The information is received at a most opportune time, as the now thoroughly enraged Roberts has determined to ruin the careers of both young people. They, however, devise a plan whereby they hope to outwit their persecutor and win success for themselves. Louis Miles gives the unsuspecting critic the comedy Payne has written, but which he, Roberts, thinks was written for himself.

Thus the comedy is produced and is a great success. Roberts appears before the curtain in answer to the call for "Author" and is accepting all the applause. Suddenly Louis Miles jumps on the stage and publicly denounces his deception. Roberts is hissed off, and Payne, the real author, receives a great ovation. The last fall of the curtain discloses the actress and the poet in a fond embrace.

EXCELSIOR

A CADET'S HONOR (March 10).—Dick passes the entrance examinations to a big military academy and, very much pleased, he calls upon his sweetheart to tell her of his good fortune. She promises to wait for him and be faithful to him. He leaves his home town, assuring Alice that he will never forget her and will return after graduation to claim her as his wife.

He enters school and is soon a full-fledged cadet in all the splendor of his new uniform In the company of his fellow students he visits different girls known as the belles of the college town. He meets beautiful Helen Jackson, the college widow, who is being "rushed" by Dale. She likes Dick and they are soon going to parties and dances together, much to Dale's disgust. Still under Helen's fascination, the boy does not write to Alice, who is heart-broken at his neglect. Dale, of a jealous disposition, looks about for some way to become revenged on the chap who has taken his girl away. One of the students receives a five hundred dollar bill, which he places in an envelope and leaves in his room. Dale steals this and hides it in Dick's desk. It is found there by the officer in charge of the barracks, who is searching the entire building. Dick is branded as a thief and is expelled in dishonor. He goes to Helen to assure her of his innocence, but she does not believe him, and refuses to have anything to do with him. Returning home, his parents comfort him and Alice forgives him and believes in his innocence. At the academy, the envelope in which the five hundred dollar bill came, is found in Dale's coat and he is accused and forced to admit his guilt. He is expelled and Dick recalled and honorably installed among his fellow students. He has learned a lesson, however, for when Helen meets him and tries to make up with him, he puts her out of his life and remains faithful to the girl who has been faithful to him.

RELIANCE

THE REPROBATE (March 12).—In an industrious, narrow-minded village, Larry is known as a reprobate because of his lazy life and the fact that he insists upon fishing on Sunday. In the poorer section of the town a starving mother pawns her wedding ring to buy food for her hungry child. The charitable ladies and the deacons visit her home and pry into her affairs. When one of them sees she wears no wedding ring, they all leave, highly indignant that they should have come in contact with such a person. The mother dies and the little girl goes out alone in the world in search of food. She enters the minister's garden, where he is busy with his sermon. He cannot bother with the crying baby—he is too busy. So without inquiring into her condition he sends her away. She follows the charitable ladies, but they do not even see her—nor do they hear her pitiful cries. But when she finds Larry, he takes her into his arms and his heart and sets a meal before her—and dries her tears. Next Sunday he is the first at the church, and, as he marches up the aisle, the ladies and minister look at him in surprise, and wonder if Larry is fit to have the care of the child. The minister alone understands and bids "the reprobate" go his way—for he is a better man than any of them. And Larry goes off with the child—but not to fish—for the sweet responsibility of the baby means something to him—and he is going to train her in the way she should go.

A REGAINED REPUTATION (March 15).—Mr. Beacon buys a diamond sunburst for his wife. He is followed home by Sarna, a crook, who looks through the window of the Beacon home and sees the husband giving the jewel to his wife. The Beacons go out motoring, but Mrs. Beacon forgets the pin, which she leaves on her dresser. A cop, Hogan, comes to visit Mary, the cook, in her kitchen, and sitting down to enjoy a fine dinner, he removes his hat and coat. Sarna gets into the house and takes the sunburst. He is about ready to get away when the auto returns. He realizes he cannot escape without being caught, and, as he is looking about for some place to hide, he sees the cop's hat and coat. He puts them on, and going out to the front door, meets Mr. and Mrs. Beacon on the steps. As they enter the house Sarna jumps into the auto and drives off at top speed. Hogan, as the master and mistress enter, looks about for his things and finds them gone. He is told of the cop on the steps and rushes out to see the machine disappearing in a cloud of dust. Hogan feels badly to think that he should have let a thief get away with a robbery almost under his nose. Seeing his motorcycle nearby gives him an idea. He will win back his reputation. Jumping on the cycle he starts in hot pursuit of the car. Overtaking Sarna, he jumps into the car and clasps the handcuffs on him. The Beacons, who have followed in a friend's car, which they met on the road, congratulate Hogan as he leads the prisoner off, after the sunburst has been restored to its rightful owner.

MAJESTIC

THE BITER BITTEN (March 9).—Lawrence, employed by a large banking house, receives his share in a yearly division of profits and hurries to surprise his wife. On reaching the flat he finds a note from her saying that she has gone shopping. The house is upset, but Lawrence attempts to get bimself some lunch, grumbling at her absence. He has no sooner seated himself at the table when the bell rings and a C. O. D. package arrives. He pays for it, but other packages arrive and he is frantic at the extravagance. When the last one has been paid for, his money is nearly all gone and he determines to teach her a lesson. He therefore puts the bedroom in a disordered condition and leaves a note saying that her extravagance has driven him to embezzle—that detectives even now may be after him. To add more color to the plot he gets the remainder of the day off, and, going to a costumer's, disguises himself as a detective and returns to the flat to frighten his wife. In the meantime, however, she has returned, found the note and rushes off to the bank to plead for mercy with the president. He comforts her, but gives the note to the bank detectives, who hurry after Lawrence. He is in the apartment when the officers arrive, and the disguise adds to the suspicions of the detectives, who refuse to believe the story he tells, and hurry him off to jail. The wife sees her husband being arrested and follows to the station house. He is flung into a cell and she telephones to her father, who joins her in short order. The bank president has arrived, and the explanation satisfies him. Suspicion is laid by word that the bank examiners had found no shortage in their annual examinations completed that noon, and Lawrence is released, completely cured of any desire to play practical jokes again, but having succeeded in showing his wife the danger of extravagance.

CHAPPIE'S CODE (March 11).—Chappie, a clever young crook, released from prison, earnestly resolves to live right. Returning to the city he seeks his old "pal" and sweetheart, "The Fairy," and finds that she, too, has reformed and is working in a small jewelry shop. His joy at this discovery is turned to sorrow upon learning that she is to marry her employer, but he bravely gives her up. Chappie's old gang is still operating in defiance of the police, and the chief of detectives decide to make Chappie go back to his old associates, win their confidence and betray them. When Chappie refuses to do this, the police begin a series of persecutions that will force him to do their bidding. He is hounded about, they won't let him hold any job, "put his landlord wise" and keep him moving, and refuse to allow him on the streets at night. Unable to get work, penniless, hopeless and homeless, his condition grows desperate. Then the shop where "The Fairy" works is robbed. Without searching for any clues they arrest Chappie. He stoutly asserts his innocence even through a brutal "sweating," but when they find a photo of "The Fairy" in his pocket, they threaten to arrest her as his accomplice. He, although innocent, agrees to confess to the crime if they will not molest her. The jeweler going to headquarters accidentally sees the photo and learns of "The Fairy's" past life. Returning to the shop, he bitterly denounces her and refuses to have anything more to do with her. In the meantime, a wealthy Mr. Brown discovers that his chauffeur is the thief and has him arrested. The thief confesses and clears Chappie, and in the presence of all the interested parties the story is unfolded. Brown sympathizes with Chappie, offers him employment, and dares the police to persecute him further. And "The Fairy," ignoring the now repentant jeweler, with a heart full of love and gratitude, gives herself to the faithful Chappie.

PATHE

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 11 (March 10).

ARTILLERY MANOEUVRES (March 11).—In the matter of artillery equipment the French army has been awarded the palm by the greatest authorities on the subject. In this film they perform some extremely hazardous feats, fording rivers, climbing steep hills and riding gullies at breakneak speed. There is a thrill in every foot of the film and it is a convincing instance of the boasted prowess of the French artilleryman.

On the same reel:

THE STICKLEBACK.—An interesting study of a peculiar species of fish, the only one of the vertebrate animals known to build a nest as the birds do.

On the same reel:

THE CHATEAU OF CHAMBORD.—A visit to the favorite residence of Francis I, King of France. The camera follows the balcony around the entire superstructure of the building, permitting close observation of the most remarkable single instance of the beauties of Renaissance architecture in existence.

A TIMELY BATH (March 12).—Heinie loved Lena and Lena loved Heinie, but father was obdurate. The meetings of the lovers were clandestine and of the fire-escape order, but Heinie gladly climbed the five ights of iron ladders every day to meet the fair girl of his dreams. Father caught him one day and put an end to his romance, but not for long. Heinie pestered the neighbors with his voyages up and down the fire-escape and they concluded to help the unsuccessful lover. One day, while father is taking a bath, the neighbors steal his clothes, nor give them back to him until Heinie and Lena have won his consent and are one.

On the same reel:

A TOUR OF THE ALPS.—If you have not journeyed through the Alps see this film. If you have journeyed through the Alps, see this film; it will bring back the memory of Nature's most beautiful handiwork.

THE LOVE THAT TURNED (March 13).—The story of a Mexican girl, who finding a wounded American on his way to join the revolutionists, nurses him back to health and learns to love him with all the ardor of her wild nature. The American, Milton Brown, sends a note to his sweetheart, asking her to help him back to the United States. His sweetheart's reply, stating that she and her father are coming to his rescue and bringing gold enough to purchase his freedom should it become necessary, falls into the hands of the Mexican girl. Her deep love turns in a moment to a deeper hatred. She informs the Mexican government of the situation and a corps of rurales is despatched to capture the party. But after a wild ride the Americans cross the border to safety. A good and timely film.

OVER THE 'PHONE (March 14).—Max Linder conducts a flirtation with a telephone operator, and after he has become sufficiently well acquainted—and you know that doesn't take long for Max—he calls up to invite her to dine with him. The sweet voice answers yes, but at the restaurant the owner of the sweet voice proves to be also the owner of a frightful face and form. However, Max learns later on that she of the sweet voice and sour face was only a substitute operator, and that the girl he intended inviting to dine is in reality a "bear."

On the same reel:

THE LUXEMBURG GARDENS.—The Luxemburg gardens were constructed at the order of Marie de Medici, and the natural coloring of the gardens reproduced in the film prove them to be all that the word beautiful can mean.

INNOCENCE (March 15).—The innocent act of a child in hiding a box of jewelry entrusted to the care of his father, sends the father to prison, and after he has escaped, sends him back again. But finally the little tot is instrumental in clearing his father's name and making life doubly sweet. The youngster uses the jewel box to fasten the head of a broken doll, and it is only after his father has suffered the agonies of a prison cell, that the youngster provides the solution to the mystery.

PILOT

LINCOLN FOR THE DEFENCE (March 13).—It is the night before Lincoln is to make his final speech to the electors that he is found in his office by his political manager with a letter in his hands and a sad look upon his face. When asked if he is ready to start for the place where the speech is to be made, Abe replies that he can't go, at which the manager is furious, telling him it will cost him his election if he fails to make the speech which he has in all sincerity promised to deliver. Lincoln is in deep thought and pays but little attention to the angry and excited expostulations which are being flung at him. The fellow keeps insisting, but Lincoln simply says that he will not go, that he has a more important engagement than his promise to make a political address; that the life of a son of a widow, who once befriended him, is at stake. Instead of starting out to make his speech, he leaves his office and travels across the country to a little country court house, where the trial of the boy, a lad about 14 or 16 years of age, for murder, is to come up. He finally reaches his destination, interviews the boy in his prison cell, and advises him to tell the truth about the whole affair, and not to be afraid, comforting the lad with the remark that he will pull him "out of this hole." When the case is called by the court, Lincoln says that he will act as counsel for the defence. The jury is accepted by him without challenge; witnesses are called and examined by the prosecuting attorney, but Lincoln does not cross-examine them, remaining all of the time in deep thought. The argument of the prosecuting attorney is finished and Lincoln tells the jury he is not going to make any arguments, but simply tells them a little story. He then tells them how when he was wornout and sick from travel, the mother of this boy, now being tried for murder, befriended him and gave him the hospitality of her home for about two weeks, during which time he often held upon his knee and consoled the little boy, the widow's son, and the boy now indicted for the killing of a fellow man. He completes his address to the jury with this remark: "All that I ask is that you deal with this little fellow as you would have other men deal, in such a case, with a son of yours." After this address a verdict of "not guilty" is brought in and the boy is acquitted. In the last scene Lincoln is seen holding back the crowd from a chair on which sits the mother with her son clasped in her arms.

"101 BISON"

THE BATTLE OF BULL RUN (3 reels) (March 18).—The Civil War is at its height, and at the time the play opens the Southern army is harassing the Unionists, and Lincoln prepares to send reinforcements South. Finding the necessity of getting more reliable information, the spy force is augumented, and among others is Grace, whose brother Harry is already in the secret service.

Grace sets out and meets Harry by the river, and together they take the coach to the Southern town that has been selected for them to spy upon. There is a prominent Colonel in the Southern army who deals with the dispatches and it is to this man that Grace throws all her energies. Harry awaits events.

The Colonel has a sweetheart, May, and Grace manages to get an introduction to her at a ball by purposely tearing her dress and appealing to May for help. This leads to an acquaintance with the Colonel, and she practices all her woman's wiles and fascinations upon him and he is impressed with her. Grace learns that important dispatches are to be forwarded and plots to get into the Colonel's house. She manages matters cleverly, and contrives to have her carriage break down before his residence and to thus get into the house.

The Colonel endeavors to get rid of her, but she stalls him off until the arrival of May, when he has to hide her in the next room. May comes to warn him about Grace, for she is suspicious and her woman's intuition tells her that Grace is there for no good. The Colonel tries to defend Grace, and while May and the Colonel are out of the room a moment, she slips in and changes the dispatches for false ones. She drops a letter by mistake, and as the Colonel and May return she escapes by way of the window, and, giving the dispatches to her brother, she gets away herself.

May sees the letter and gives it to the Colonel. It is a letter of commendation from the North and clearly shows the woman's mission. A servant has seen Harry go and his meeting with Grace, and the Colonel, mad throughout at being deceived and outwitted by a woman, rides off after Harry. He catches up with him as they ride into the battlefield, and in a hand-to-hand duel, Harry is killed by the Colonel, who is himself mortally wounded by a stray bullet.

Grace returns to Washington and receives compliments and rewards. She returns to her home with a clouded conscience, and while sitting looking at her reward, the spectres of Harry and the Colonel appear and beckon her. She is forced to go with them, and together they appear on the battlefield and they show her their own bodies, and slowly they fade away and their spectres enter their dead bodies.

She comes to and staggers to the stairs to get assistance. She faints and falls down the stairway and dies.

VITAGRAPH

HIS HONOR, THE MAYOR (Mar. 12).—Mr. Bullington is elected Mayor of his town and is much elated at the honor. His wife receives a letter from her maiden Aunt Minerva, from whom she has financial expectations, saying that she is coming to visit them. She asks them, besides a bedroom, to give her some place to use as an office, as she has business to transact. They fix up an old storeroom for her. One of the chief "planks" on which Bullington has been elected is his strong opposition to votes for women and his promise to fight them. He is horror-stricken to find that Minerva, on her arrival, is an ardent advocate of female suffrage. She holds meetings in his house, upbraids him for his principles, and threatens to cut him and his wife out of her will if he does not sustain her cause and patronize her meetings. He yields and at once gets himself into hot water with those who elected him. Mr. Balder and Mr. Carter, once his staunch supporters, call on him to demand his resignation, but Bullington has the happy thought to turn Minerva on them. She talks them nearly dead, and ends by capturing both to speak in favor of female suffrage at her next meeting. Bullington retains his place as Mayor and has the laugh on his friends for being such easy marks to Minerva's arguments.

GREAT NORTHERN

FRITZ AND OSCAR OUT OF LUCK (Mar. 15).—This is a humorous little tale of two portly comedians who find themselves "down and out" in an obscure village far away from the scenes of their earlier triumphs. They have reached the end of their financial resources and decide, after much furious thinking, that something desperate must be resorted to if they are to eat and get back to the Rialto. They engage a large hall, after impressing the landlord with their supposed fame, and hang a curtain across the center of the room. Then they cause to be advertised an announcement that two of the world's most famous comedians will appear and that as a matter of courtesy Madame Berhardt will consent to supply a classical dance. The entire village turns out to enjoy the advertised treat and standing room is at a premium. At one end of the hall, divided by the curtain, Fritz takes the money from the expectant amusement seekers and at the other end Oscar performs a like service. When the hall has been filled to capacity on either side of the curtain, the two scheming comedians depart, silently and swiftly. Time passes, and the audiences, for there are two, become impatient. Hand clapping and whistling are heard on one side of the curtain and this is repeated on the other side. Finally the audiences become suspicious and the curtain is pulled aside. When the trick is discovered the two audiences join issues and with a cry of rage the villagers scour the countryside in search of the scheming comedians. They are overtaken after an exciting and comical chase and what happens to Fritz and Oscar must be seen to be fully appreciated. Poor Fritz. Poor Oscar.

On the same reel is a scenic entitled "Environs of Silkeborg, Jutland, Denmark."

MISS MARBURY TO USE EDUCATIONAL AND RELIGIOUS PICTURES OF GAUMONT AT BERKELEY THEATRE

The name of Miss Elisabeth Marbury has spelled success in many a theatrical and dramatic undertaking in America, and the statement that she has now become intensely interested in the motion picture comes as one of the most important pieces of news in the history of Cinematography. Beginning March 11th, Miss Marbury will use the Berkeley Theatre for three entire weeks, using exclusively the educational and religious pictures of the famous French firm of Gaumont. When one of the greatest powers in American dramatic circles thus undertakes, entirely of her own volition to show the public the higher possibilities of the motion picture it is certainly splendid proof that Cinematography has at last come into its own as an instrument of higher culture.

"The idea came to me last summer," said Miss Marbury, "when I saw the magnificent pictures presented by M. Leon Gaumont in the Hippodrome at Paris. I am not at all interested in the sensational, melodramatic pictures now being sent broadcast over the land, but I am intensely interested in educational, scenic, industrial and scientific films, especially the beautiful hand-colored ones; now being produced by the best manufacturers of Europe and America. I propose to show the better classes of New York theatregoers the real possibilities of this new art.

"In offices and drawing-rooms I hear this matter of the motion picture constantly discussed, and I want to say that the common sentiment is that the present state of affairs along this line cannot continue. The tawdry theatres with their cheap sensationalism must go, and the motion picture makers must realize their importance as leaders in public thought and emotions, and therefore in public welfare. My ambition is not at all to compete with the motion picture theatre as it now exists, but to offer only that which will appeal to the intellect and the most refined emotions of the best theatre patrons in the city of New York."

The first and third week of Miss Marbury's programmes will deal largely with European peoples, scenes and customs, while the second week, March 17th to March 22nd, known in many churches as Holy Week, will be given over exclusively to religious pictures, including a two-reel "Life of Christ," a two-reel hand-colored "Story of Esther," considered one of the finest pictures every produced in Europe, and a highly dramatic film entitled "The Feast of Belshazzar." The experiment will be watched with keenest interest by all connected with the art and industry of motion pictures; for it is an attempt by a leader in the highest form of American drama to introduce Cinematography to the very audience that the art most desires and needs.

"KINEMACOLOR" ON THE PROCTOR CIRCUIT

F. F. Proctor has just signed a contract with Henry J. Brock, President of the Kinemacolor Company of America, whereby the photoplays now being produced by the Kinemacolor studios in Los Angeles, Cal, as well as the marvelous views of Western scenery photographed with all Nature's hues, and characteristic scenes and costumes of foreign countries which are being recorded by camera experts of this great international picture corporation, will be given in theatres of the Proctor Circuit.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Thanhouser

"Sherlock Holmes Solves the Sign of the Four" is an exceedingly interesting release of the detective order. The story, which is told in two reels, is intensely interesting, and hinges around a box of treasure which has been stolen from an Indian Rajah. By foul means the treasure has become the property of Major Sholto, a British Army officer. At the death of the officer a letter is left which states that the treasure must be divided between his two sons and a Miss Morstan, a niece of the Major's. Trouble ensues over the division of the treasure, and one day the eldest brother is found dead with a note pinned on his chest with the Sign of the Four, and the jewels gone. Reel two tells the true story of the gems and how they were stolen and misappropriated in the confession of those who killed and robbed the son of Major Sholto.

Majestic

"Shirts and Shocks," from Majestic, is a winner for comedy: one of the best that has been offered in Independent circles for some time. In this comedy the bridegroom, instead of the bride, is the centre of attraction, and it is assuredly a scream.

"The Message in a Cocoanut" is a very excellent drama in two reels. The plot is interesting, and the atmosphere of the Cannibal Island, with its primitive methods of warfare, is well represented.

Reliance

"The Birthday Cake," from Reliance, is a good story, in which some carelessness has been exhibited in the production. A great deal of pathos has been worked into it through the excellence of the players, but it is unfortunate that in view of the lapse of years new costumes had not been provided them on their reappearance in the story.

Gaumont

"The Death of Lucrece," is with scarcely an exception the most exquisite bit of motion picture photography that has ever been exhibited. The delicate beauty of coloring which has been brought into play in this interesting and exceptional Roman drama is beyond description.

"Sweet Familiar Faces" is a rare treat in comedy, having the snap and the comic situations necessary to carry out smoothly the business of the comedy.

American

"Father's Finish" is a comedy in which the "Flying A" players have shown themselves equal to the comic situations offered them. It is very funny and will get over with any audience

"Famous Illinois Canyon and Starved Rock," on the same reel, is a scenic of peculiar interest on account of the atmosphere of legendry surrounding these precincts.

Rex

"In the South Seas" is a splendidly staged drama the story of which hinges around a pearl diver, who has been stricken with blindness, and his wife, who taking his place at his work, finds a pearl of great price. A portion of the story takes place on board a Chinese trading vessel where the couple are imprisoned as the Chinese seek to gain possession of the pearl. The story is worked out in a very tragic manner and is intensely interesting.

Vitagraph

"The Old Guard" has fine merits as a drama; and it may be said that nothing has been lost sight of in the staging of the production. There is a strong touch of pathos in the story which has been well brought out.

Edison

"All on Account of a Transfer" is one of the funniest comedies that has been recently staged in moving pictures. It reflects much not only on the careful work of the Edison director, but also on the players.

"A Will and a Way" of the series of "What Happened to Mary" follows out the general meritorious character of the former Edison releases of this series. It is a tremendous thrill from beginning to end.

Kalem

"Sally's Garden" gives a splendid opportunity to the Kalem players to display their several capacities for dealing with the comic situation in pictures. This film is excellent, and may be exhibited before any audience.

Pilot

"The Two Glasses," adapted from a poem by Ella Wheeler Wilcox is a symbolical play in which a wine glass and a water glass exchange confidences, competing one against the other for supremacy of usefulness. The wine glass boasts the overthrow of men in city positions, the dethronement of kings, etc., while the humble water glass can tell only of comfort given the wretched. The finale shows the wine glass tottering and falling, overcome with remorse at the purity and superiority of the tales of prowess of the water glass.

This is a very excellently prepared film.

Biograph

"Love in an Apartment Hotel" is a very excellent comedy-drama splendidly played by clever Biograph players. The young lady playing the part of the maid is specially well adapted to that particular role, and is the center piece of the comic situations.

Selig

"The Understudy" gives remarkable opportunities for strong emotional work. This film is full of interest, and has been most satisfactorily worked out.

Pathe

"The Children of Japan" is full of interest. As an educational film it is of excellent quality, showing as it does the customs of that country.

Rex

"The Great Gavton Mystery" in two reels is one of the strongest detective stories that we have seen in moving pictures. Some splendid effects have been secured through triple exposure.

Mecca

"The Fisher Lady," though not particularly strong in plot, is saved in a measure by the well chosen exteriors, many of them of necessity sea scenes.

Eclair

"The Tester Tested" is an excellent sample of real comedy which it would be well for scenarios writers to see and profit by.

"Cocoa Cultivation" on the same reel is most interesting, and shows the manner of cultivating, gathering and preparing the cocoa bean.

Lubin

"The Supreme Sacrifice" has a strong heart interest, and is beautifully produced.

AMERICAN USES HOME OF "ROSARY" AUTHOR IN PICTURES

"In Another's Nest" is the title of a coming release of the American Film Mfg. Company, which will probably be given an additional interest when it is known that the entire picture was made on the grounds and through buildings of the famous Glendassry Estate, home of the late Robert Cameron Rogers, author of "The Rosary." Needless to say, it is one of the show places of the show place city of Santa Barbara. The high esthetic sense and magnificent photography will be delighted with the results obtained in "In Another's Nest."

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC.,

LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Office—133 Third Avenue.

Letters are coming into the office of the Moving Picture Machine Operators Union of Greater New York, Inc., Local No. 1, from all parts of the country stating that the writers are members of various locals of the I. A. T. S. E., and that they are taking up our cause in demanding justice, and that the writers are aware of the existing trouble, and know the situation in New York City.

The letters prove beyond a douht that their writers will stand hy Local No. 1 of New York, and cannot understand how on earth Local No. 35 ever tried to monopolize the many different kinds of work in the theatrical industry, and, what is a greater surprise to all concerned, how does Local No. 35 account for accepting into their ranks a character like Dick De Costa and above all to elect him as chief executive or president of their department? I have answered many of the letters, and explained the many things they desired to know and advised them to get the Moving Picture News every week, which is a strict union paper and has its columns open to all operators and interested organizations.

Now that so many have learned about Dick De Costa, the famous strikebreaker of international fame, for what he has done, not only in the Fox strike, but in the strike of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers as well, I am going to ask those men who have read the past two issues of the Moving Picture News a few questions, and they are:

Do you want to receive lessons and be guided hy a strikebreaker?

Do you think he is a man of character to he president of a union?

Do you think it right to have Dick De Costa give rulings and decisions to union men, and above all mar the emblem of an international body and constitution?

Think it over, hrothers, and send in your answers to the Moving Picture News, and if you do not want your name to be connected with a rebel of organized lahor he a brave soldier in the rank and file of organized lahor and show you're true blue, just the same as you would to your country if a war was on and you had captured a rebel or traitor to the cause.

All letters sent to the News will be published unless you state in your letter that you do not wish your name to be made public. But don't he afraid to express your opinion on the matter, for this Dick De Costa is a Benedict Arnold, and if you had the opportunity to see this strikebreaker which a good many have had and a good many do see him daily you would not hesitate to give your opinion. Now to the boys who have seen him lately.

Have you heard the groans and sighs coming from Dick De Costa, of strikebreaking fame? Probahly you have. Of course, those sighs and groans give evidence of pain, and Dick De Costa, who hy this time is well known all over the country for being the tool of hosses, feels pretty warm; in fact, he thinks the seasons have changed and summer has come too soon, for he is sweating heads the size of marbles since he has discovered that the editor of the Chat Column and representative of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 of G. N. Y. has been guilty of exposing his (Dick De Costa's) black career, and you know, of course, that poor fellow, the president of department of Local No. 35, Dick De Costa, doesn't like to have anyone know that he is a rascal, or that he had bargained with unfair electrical contractors in forming an organization to scah on his former brothers when he was a member of the I. B. E. W. He is doing all he possibly can at present to make others believe he is a good union man and has hypnotized the members of the department of Local No. 35, I. A. T. S. E., into believing that he is, and that he is the hest man they could find for to be president. He is a good union man sometimes, especially in time of a strike. He will take the men off the job, and do the hoss a favor by taking off his hat and coat and go to work himself. Let us trust that the members of No. 35 will open their eyes and see the grave mistake they made hy the way they ruled the ex-auxiliary which is now known as Local No. 1 and who will shortly receive justice, and above all the great mistake they (Local No. 35) made in allowing Dick De Costa into their ranks to he made president of their new department.

RALPH KNASTER, Business Representative.

The Moving Picture Machine Operators Union of Greater New York, Inc., Local No. 1, held their regular meeting last Monday night at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street. It was a full dress meeting, as most of the members attended a wedding before the meeting. The fortunate member, who thought life was naught without a better half, was Brother Louis Schwartz, and took the oath to support his missing rib, not with splints, but good hard cash. Poor Brother Louis was hunting many months, yes, years, to find his missing rib, and today he is feeling prouder than anyone in this great metropolis. The most fortunate young woman, Mrs. Louis Schwartz, who had that missing rib, is very proud that it is a union one and had invited all the members of Local No. 1 to enjoy the festivity. The members who attended the wedding arrived at the meeting in time to take hand in the election of officers and the following officers were elected and installed:

President, Robert Goldblatt; vice-president, James Daisie; secretary and treasurer, Robert Levy; recording secretary, George Epstein; sergeant-at-arms, Edward Spinola; business representative, Ralph J. Knaster.

The above were elected unanimously.

Trustees elected were Brothers Mike Berkowitz, J. A. Leroy and B. A. Friedman. Elected to act on executive board were Brothers Sam Kaplan, Theodore Ridder and Sam Talofsky, and the executive officers' meeting was called at 12.30 A. M. and was adjourned at 4 A. M.

THE FLAMING ARROW

(Bison 101. Released March 11th)

The above is a very splendidly staged military picture of the perilous days of the Indian vs. the White Man in the West, and is full of the interest occasioned by the portrayal of thrilling scenes of the cruel warfare of those early days. The story runs thus:

Bailey, the squaw man, is panning gold on his claim, watched by White Eagle, his half-breed son, and Chief Black Eagle, who is attached to both father and son. Flying Bird, the mother of White Eagle, has dinner ready and comes out to call the men in. The Chief goes unwillingly.

The Apaches declare war upon Black Eagle and his tribe, by sending a bundle of arrows tied with a snakeskin, to Black Eagle. The latter defies him by breaking one of the arrows and returning it to the Apache Chief.

In the war that ensues Bailey is killed, and Flying Bird, inconsolable, kills herself over his grave.

A new frontier post is established, much to the annoyance of the Indians. One Smalley seeks the hand of the daughter of the Colonel of the Fort in marriage, is repulsed by him, and straightway allies himself with Pasedo, a Mexican. Together they stir up trouble, by shooting an Indian when the Colonel and his men are attending the Indian sports. Smalley is taken by White Eagle, who is now a chief, and at whose invitation the soldiers have come to the Indian encampment. Pasedo aids him to escape, and Smalley later abducts Dorothy, the daughter of the Colonel, and takes her away to the camp of Moon Face. White Eagle offers to rescue her, telling her father that a flaming arrow will be the sign of his success. A number of interesting skirmishes take place, which end in a fierce battle between the two contending Indian factions and the Fort Cavalry. In the midst of the battle, the flaming arrow is flashed by White Eagle, and the Colonel knows his daughter is safe. Dorothy is restored to the arms of her father, and White Eagle receives the congratulations of all.

"FEATHERTOP" MAKES A FINE FILM

Another very remarkable photoplay taken by Kinemacolor, adapted from Nathaniel Hawthorne's well-known story of Feathertop. An old witch makes a scarecrow; with the help of the devil she endows this creature with life, and sends it forth to woo the daughter of her bitter enemy. Later Feathertop sees in the mirror, not the reflection of the man she thinks him, but the thing he really is. Love makes him a man for the moment.

Feathertop rushes to his creator, refuses longer to smoke the enchanted pipe which kept him alive, and falls at the feet of the witch, a heap of sticks and straw with a pumpkin head.

A beautiful finish to the picture shows a cornfield with the scarecrow silhouetted against a gorgeous sunset sky, —this effect being possible only in Kinemacolor.

WHAT SANTA BARBARA OFFERS THE AMERICAN FILM MFG. CO.

During the present rush of picture companies to Los Angeles, the American Film Mfg. Company, who are building what is believed to be one of the finest studios in America, is constantly asked, "What does Santa Barbara offer that other parts of California cannot?"

Santa Barbara is probably the most beautiful as well as most exclusive little city in California. It is the home of the ultrarich and the world-famous, while Pasadena and San Diego cater to the more moderately successful. From the windows of the studio, one can see the home of E. P. Ripley, president of the Santa Fe, while across the street lies the magnificent estate of Tiffany, the New York jeweler. Closely adjoining is the winter home of Stewart Edward White, the novelist, of Winston Churchill, Owen Wister, and other literary stars. The Santa Barbara telephone book is almost a Hall of Fame, and the Easterner is astonished at the number of world-familiar names which adorn its pages. All of these magnificent estates have been thrown open to the players of the American. From slight prejudice to toleration and then to genuine welcome is the history of the "Flying A" in Santa Barbara. The tradespeople are anxious to please, society functions are hardly complete without one or more of the popular players, and all the obvious advantages that accrue from such a condition are being made a part of "Flying A" pictures. As handsomer backgrounds do not exist in America, or clearer, better photography, it can be easily seen why the American has decided to make its permanent home in the beautiful winter resort by the sea.

The California Theatre is being remodeled; it is to be the most up-to-date house in Los Angeles, and will be managed by James W. Barlow, who has successfully managed "The National," "The Wonderland," and "The Gem" in this city. Licensed pictures will be used by the new management.

The Bioscope, England's leading motion picture trade paper, of Oct. 24th, 1912, in an account of the opening of the new Shaftesbury Ave. Picture Theatre, of London, says:

Two Simplex Projectors are installed, and we can say no more than that they give a picture which certainly could not be beaten. This is high testimony, and well deserved."

THE CENSORING OF FILM

ONE of the most difficult problems confronting the industry to-day is that of the film censor. In the issue of March 1st I took up the question of the State censorship, in which I said: "State censorship, unless every State adopted the same legislation, would be very chaotic. In the course of a mail or two I received a letter from a particular friend of mine who is very interested in the question of censoring. I extract the following from his letter:

> Brother Saunders, I am inclined to think you do do not fully understand the Ohio position and I will again state that it is absolutely impossible for Ohio or any other state to endorse the National Censor Board. It has no legal standing and if you want it endorsed in New York, why don't you have a law passed in the State of New York endorsing it?
> Their work has been good We all appreciate it. But why advise or advocate a censor board that has no legal standing, and even in New York, after condemning a picture, they take it right down and run it. There is only one way out of this situation and the only feasible plan Ohio offers. If the national government can legally establish a censor board, it would be a grand thing, and I certainly would favor it, but when you are advised by the ablest attorneys in the United States that an interstate commerce commission cannot intervene, neither can the national government, what would you expect us to do in Ohio, simply sit still and let the constitutional amendment which has been voted on, become a law and the censoring of all of the pictures in the state come under the local police power, which would have absolute control? Stop and think what this would mean! The idea of Hamilton, Ohio, censoring pictures, and when they come to Cincinnati, be censored again and then sent to Middletown and there they have to be censored and so on, which would mean probably one hundred or more censor boards in Ohio, and everybody would not be as accommodating as the New York Censor Board. They would demand pay and it would become a political asset and the business would be strangled to death.
> I am amazed at the attitude of those who oppose a state censor board in the State of Ohio, and the National Censor Congress, as the Ohio bill provides for.
> My ideas have always been for us to consent to the best plan proposed. As there has been none proposed or suggested to relieve the situation, the Ohio Censor Board should be endorsed by every state in the Union and New York should get busy and pass the same kind of a law that Ohio will pass, and there should be a national censor congress created and legally censor all pictures for all states. It would be a grand thing for manufacturers and all of us if they could proceed without any censoring whatsoever. But it is impossible, as some manufacturers are the same as some exhibitors: in business strictly for the almighty dollar.
> Without a censor bill or board those that care nothing whatsoever about the business, would demand suggestive and immoral pictures and you know if there was a demand for this kind of pictures on the market, they would be produced, hence the necessity of a censor board.

The above is so much to the point that I felt it best to give it all due prominence. By so doing the atmosphere will be very largely cleared, and those who do not understand the problem will be aided. Personally, as I have said in previous editorials, I am fully in favor of the exhibitors in every State following along the lines of Ohio, for which I think we have to thank the President of the National League, M. A. Neff. If I am mistaken in this, my correspondent must give me the full information as to the responsibility for this admirable measure of Ohio. This State is peculiarly situated at this time, and I think it would be well for all other States to wait until Ohio has perfected their Censor Board.

The principal thing needed is for every State league to secure the co-operation with the Censor Congress as proposed by the Ohio bill and their State Legislature to introduce such a bill, and then the interstate question will be settled, and if a National Censor Congress can be gotten together the whole problem will be solved. Who will be the first in New York to take the bull by the horns and get the bill introduced in Albany?

Two or three States can form a National Congress to co-operate with all the States and legally censor all the pictures, without cost to anyone. All each State has to do is to endorse the Censor Congress, which is a guarantee that all pictures shown in any State will be absolutely free from anything offensive, and by endorsing the Censor Congress each State will assist in raising the standard of pictures and for all time settle the ownership question.

NATIONAL EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

President Neff has called the following conventions: Tennessee will meet in convention at the Tulane Hotel, Nashville, Tenn., on Saturday morning, March 22, 1913; National Vice-President W. H. Wasserman, of Nashville, will have full charge of arrangements for the convention. We ask every exhibitor in Tennessee to communicate with Mr. Wasserman; full information will be given. Big preparations are being made for the convention.

Exhibitors of the State of Alabama will meet in Birmingham at the Hillman Hotel at 10 a.m. Monday, March 24, 1913; Alex Wall, of Birmingham, Ala., will have full charge of arrangements for the Alabama convention. Birmingham exhibitors are enthusiastic and have already made application and sent in a fee for a charter. Matters of importance in Alabama that vitally interest every exhibitor in the state, will be taken up at the convention. It is confidently expected that every exhibitor in the State of Alabama that can possibly be at Birmingham on the 24th will be there.

Louisiana will meet in New Orleans at the Grunewald Hotel at 10 a.m. Thursday morning, March 26, 1913. W. H. Gueringer, Alamo Theatre, New Orleans, will have full charge of arrangements. We ask Louisiana exhibitors to please communicate with him. When Louisiana was organized at Shreveport last year, there were only just enough present to perfect an organization; now that New Orleans is ready to come into the organization and the whole state realizes the benefits to be derived, hence the calling of the convention and the co-operation of the exhibitors in the state with the national officers.

On March 28th the exhibitors of the State of Mississippi will meet in Gulfport; all arrangements will be made by the national vice-president, Fred Abbley, New Dixie Theatre, Gulfport, for holding the convention. For full particulars Mississippi exhibitors will please address Mr. Abbley. Strong sentiment for organization prevails throughout the Southern States.

THE VENGEANCE OF HEAVEN
Reliance release March 19th.

President Neff will organize Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi, and will personally attend all of these conventions. If he has time left, after organizing these four states, he expects to run over into Texas to consult with Texas exhibitors. If not, he will ask some of the officers of Texas to arrange to meet him in New New Orleans.

* * * *

West Virginia will also hold a big convention on the 15th and 16th of April. Mr. Neff expects to be present at the West Virginia convention; L. R. Thomas, Moundsville, W. Va., state secretary, is chairman of the committee on arrangements. All the exhibitors of the State of West Virginia should communicate with Secretary Thomas.

President Neff was in Columbus three days of this week in consultation with the state officials in regard to some bills before the legislature and the new building code. Ohio is active and alert to everything pertaining to the interest of the motion picture exhibitors. Mr. Neff left Cincinnati for New York Saturday evening and will return Thursday or Friday.

We especially desire to call the attention of all exhibitors throughout the states that April 8th is Exhibitors' Day, and suggest that all state officers advise their members. Those who desire to make Exhibitors' Day specially attractive should make arrangements at the earliest possible date to feature their entertainments on that date, and we believe that they will find it will be very satisfactory financially.

ANSWER TO MANY LETTERS RECEIVED BY M. A. NEFF

In regard to advertisements appearing in pictures, five letters have been received in the past two days in regard to a picture entitled "The Family Jar" released by Pathe, January 18, 1913 Mr. A. Engle, manager, Empire Theatre at Fort Dodge, Ia., is the last gentleman to protest against the advertisement that seems to appear in this picture. He states that "the picture is nothing more nor less than an advertisement for a nut company.

My attention for the past year has been called to the various advertisements that appear in pictures. Now I wish to be frank and just in regard to the pictures containing advertisements. First, I do not believe a censor board should pass pictures containing advertisements of the kind mentioned. Second, I do not believe the manufacturers purposely place these advertisements in their pictures but really believe it to be neglect on the part of the camera man. It would seem, however, that a manufacturer would have someone to closely scrutinize all of their films and when an advertisement appears, would cut it out; this would immediately eliminate all effort on the part of advertisers to discontinue trying to appear before the camera man when he is taking the picture, and every camera man should have explicit instructions to see that advertisements were not taken. It is not fair to the exchanges who have to pay so much per foot for advertising films. It is not fair to the exhibitors, the displaying of advertisements in film for the financial benefit of others. It is more unjust to the public, to force them to sit and look at an advertisement which they do not care to see. I would advise every exhibitor, where an advertisement appears in a film, to refuse to run the film and also to refust to pay rent on such films. It is not fair and just to try to force the exhibitors to run advertising films free.

Several exhibitors I know have gone to the trouble of cutting out advertisements and not run the advertisement at all.

As I am in favor of a censor board, I believe all stalling in pictures and advertisements should be looked upon as undesirable, and whoever censors the pictures should see to it that a square deal is given to everybody.

M. A. NEFF.

Joe Farnham, who has charge of the ball program for the coming big event of the Screen Club, reports a big interest being taken and that space in the program is going fast. Ten thousand copies will be issued and they will be a work of art both in typography and binding.

M. A. NEFF IN NEW YORK TO LOOK AFTER M. P. E. LEAGUE INTERESTS

Mr. Samuels Goes to London as Representative for Coming Exposition

Mr. Neff has been in New York City for the last three days working up matters pertinent to the League, and everything is in a very harmonious condition. Prospects for future progress are exceedingly bright, and Mr. Neff is elated at the progress so abundantly noticeable. While in New York Mr. Neff met Mr. Holliman.

Mr. Trigger and the majority of the members were present at a meeting in which they took up the matter of having an American representative of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League at the Exhibitors' Conference in London at the Olympia, whch takes place on March 22d-29th. Mr. Samuels was unanimously elected as the representative, and to take charge of the European interests of the International Exposition to be held at the Grand Central Palace, New York, on July 7th-12th.

Mr. Samuels will leave New York on the Philadelphia on Saturday, March 15th, arriving at Southampton on the 22d, in time to get to London for the opening of the conference on that day. The management of the London conference have kindly reserved space for the American representative, and will take entire charge of him while there.

On account of the large amount of correspondence the exposition has received from the European manufacturers, it was decided that this will be the quickest and most expeditious way of closing contracts with the manufacturers for space at the coming exposition.

In the event of nothing else of importance occurring, Mr. Samuels anticipates returning from Southampton on the last day of the conference, March 29th, but if in the interests of the exposition it should require a longer stay, he will stay over for a week, returning on the first Sunday in April.

During Mr. Samuels' absence the affairs of the exposition will be taken care of by Mr. Frank Tischner, the chairman of the committee, who will be ably assisted by Mr. Samuel Trigger and Mr. Ray, late of the New York Clipper, who will take Mr. Samuels' desk during his absence.

HIS MAJESTY, GEORGE V, AND CINEMATOGRAPHY

Advices from London are to hand with the information that motion pictures of the Paul J. Rainey hunt were, by royal command, given at Buckingham Palace before Their Majesties, the King and Queen of England, Great Britain, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and a few other places, including part of South Africa, where the Paul J. Rainey African Hunt Pictures were taken. By special invitation there were also present other kings and queens of the neighboring countries of poor old henpecked England. What a splendid testimonial for Cinematography is this. Moving pictures that are rare, faithful without faking, tender, true and tempting, as nature is her very self, and while this royal party were regaling themselves on this feast of feasts for the eyes, there were others living in London who were kicking themselves round the nearest corner (figuratively) because they had lacked the wisdom the Wise Men of the East are supposed to have from time immemorial.

Immediately upon the receipt of the cable message that the above had taken place, I called up my good friend Jack Hemment, the Man of the Hour, who photographed these scenes and asked him for his version of the story. He said: "Last July I went to Europe representing the Jungle Film Company, who own the Paul J. Rainey Hunt Pictures. I tarried in London, Paris, Berlin, and other important Continental places, for some time trying to show the wiseacres of dear old England what a good thing the wonderful Hunt Pictures were and how easy they could be had. Quite cheap, considering their class, but all was of no value. Thes wiseacres threw up their hands in holy horror at the price asked, and thought of asking a Guy's Hospital expert to pass on my sanity.

"After a couple of months Carl Laemmle and myself met one day in Charing Cross Road, both of us on our way back to the United States after a holiday and business trip combined. Laemmle persuaded me to stay in London for a few weeks and look for a customer for the pictures. I went to work and hunted up a friend of his in the business, quite near the British Museum, told him my story, and he in turn introduced me to the one man in all England, if there was one, who had plenty of gold and knew a good thing when he saw it. This man had a business not far from St. Martin's Lane. Another wise man with whom I had a strong letter held forth in Soho Square (and his name was not Bishop, although it began with a "B."). I never saw this gentleman. He made three appointments with me and never kept one. On my third visit to Mr. B.'s barracks I left my letter, which stated my business, and I also left word that if he wanted to see the films with a view to purchase I could be found at my hotel. I never heard from Mr. B.

"The third big man who would likely take an interest in films was in Paris at this time. Fortunately he returned, and I took particular pains to have him see the six reels under proper conditions, but not a sign of anything did I see on his unexpressionless face which would indicate he would buy. "Very nice, old chap," said he, "but I must tell you I am afraid you will never get the enormous amount you ask for them," "Well," said I, "what do you really think they are worth? "Now, my boy," said he, "I want to be perfectly frank with you, and I hope you won't be offended when I tell you that I don't think they would prove half as good a drawing card as the B——t pictures, and I did not pay auywhere near as much as you want, so I hope you won't feel hurt or down in the dumps when I tell you that I shall think a long, long time before I pay you a thousand quids for them." I told him he was very kind and considerate. I told the other wise men the same thing after I had cabled to Mr. Laemmle this one solitary offer, receiving in reply that I was not to bother with any more parties and call off any deal short of our original figure. The films were neither quails nor jackasses, and their maintenances would not cost as much as the aforesaid.

"Before leaving England I thought I would not let these wise gentlemen disillusionize themselves so far as my observations were concerned, so I gathered them together one by one, and after I had placed the best Holbern before them and we were lingering over our cigars and Turkish demi-tasse, I said: 'Gentlemen, we have been accused of having close corporations and trusts in America, but I am firmly of the opinion you have us skinned to a frazzle. Now, when we come back and put these very same pictures on, do not say you did not have a chance to get them. Then you wonder how we do. Well, just ask Tommy Grant and he will tell you that a certain pro-photographer who was here and in B. E. A. and recently paid a visit to New York told Mr. Hemment that he would not be allowed to show the Paul J. Rainey Hunt Pictures in England, which only goes to prove that all wise men do not come from the East, as events have proved that the Paul J. Rainey Pictures are the biggest drawing card ever put on the screen either here or abroad, and the News has nothing but the highest praise for J C. Hemment, who is shortly to make another trip to hunt other wild game in Africa. And this time he will do it in natural colors.' "

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY

A change has been made in the personnel of the officers of the Motion Picture Patents Company. William Pelzer resigned as secretary of the Patents Company, and George Scull was elected to fill the vacancy and is now vice-president and secretary. Mr. Pelzer retains his office as secretary of the General Film Company.

C. H. Wilson, of the Edison Company, is elected director of the Patents Company to fill the vacancy left by Mr. Pelzer's withdrawal. This leaves the officers of the Patents Company as follows: Henry N. Marvin, of Biograph, president; George Scull, of Edison, vice-president and secretary, and J. J. Kennedy, of Biograph, treasurer.

JUST GOSSIP

By The Mahoney

"My mouth shall speak truth."—Prov. viii, 7.

Mahoney is a strict adherent of the above proverb, and nothing shall get by, without recording, always presuming it is the truth.

Mahoney Frank Smiley, he of the genial smile and Chesterfieldian manner, is now a fixture with the "Ryno," and is giving an excellent account of himself. Frank's experience has been varied and interesting. For four years Uncle Sam claimed him as commissioned officer in the navy, during which period he visited many countries. His time of service expiring, he was discharged with honorable mention, and being gifted with an excellent voice, the stage soon discovered him. Tiring of the itinerant existence of theatrical life, he entered the motion picture field, and soon established himself as a favorite. Frank has been seen to great advantage in many notable films, in leading parts, both comedy and dramatic, during the past year.

Mahoney Charley Graham, the Antinous of the Studios, who fears nothing, and will take any sort of chance, from offering himself as a battering ram for an automobile to falling from a sixteen-story building, has fully recovered from his recent mishap while doing "dangerous stunt" duty in a recent Imp film, and is back at the "works" again.

Mahoney Harry Edwards, whose pedigree extends back to King Fergus of Erin, is a pioneer Mahoney.

Harry's wonderful personality lends an atmosphere of optimism to all surroundings where his presence is in evidence. Nothing "phases" him. When the studios fail of emolument, Harry can hie himself to the Colonial, the Alhambra, Hammerstein's, or the Fifth Avenue, don the mask of Monus, hearken for his entrance music, step forth, and produce one long, continuous howl of laughter, for fifteen to forty minutes.

Harry is equally diverting in sidewalk conversation.

Mahoney "Jack" Mahoney (a connection of THE Mahoney, but several times removed) is still on the visiting list of the various studios.

Jack's accomplishments are diverse and multiform. He can write scenarios, direct productions, or lend valuable aid in their development, by acting in them.

So Jack claims.

Mahoney Herbert Brennan (Brenon for euphony, like Du Fay for Duffy and O'Bréon for O'Brien) is rapidly adding fame to his already firmly established record as a director of the first rank, by his recent excellent efforts with the Universal.

Herb's reputation for unselfishness is proverbial. He is ever ready to recognize talent and ability, and would even welcome Mahoney Griffiths, of the Biograph, should Mahoney "Julius" so elect.

Mahoney Frank Karrington, is an excellent example of the efficacy of dramatic training for work in motion pictures. Frank's experience as a disciple of Thespis, extends back to—well, we don't dare trifle with dates, as age and mellowness are rarely appreciated except in whiskey, wines and Camembert cheese.

Frank has been a fixture with Majestic and Reliance forces for some time past, and his appearance on the screen in their various splendid releases always occasions a buzz of favorable comment.

Mahoney Horace Vinton, is again in evidence along the line after twelve weeks of distressing "road fag." He says some one is a joke, and that he is at a loss to know who. Is sufficiently modest, however, to admit that he may be the "giek" and not know it. Horace has sacrificed his moustache at the shrine of Thespis, and when interrogated remarked: "The Glenroy is expected back from England, and fearing his wrath should he recognize me, I've disguised myself."

Mahoney King Baggot—No! We nearly committed ourselves, for he is "King," and we fear "lese majesty" should we dare transgress.

Forgotten Lore

The recent unfortunate defection, on the part of that prince of good fellows, Charles P. Elliott, who did more to advance salaries of vaudeville performers than anyone in the business, recalls a circumstance in the early Cinematography life of one of the wealthiest and most important factors in the industry.

In the spring of 1896, Charley, immaculately clad, was standing in front of Hopkins' Theatre in State Street, Chicago, while throngs were struggling to reach the box-office. A sturdily built man approached him and remarked:

"I have a novelty, Mr. Elliott, and would like to show it in your theatre."

"What's the nature of it?" asked Charley.

"It's a moving picture machine," replied the man.

"Bring it along and we'll look it over," answered Charley, ever on the alert for novelties.

Grateful for the opportunity, the man hurried back to his little atelier in Peck Court with a light heart.

Between the afternoon and night performances the necessary connections were made, and that night W. N. Selig (the man above referred to), now the head of the world-famous Selig Company, projected upon an improvised screen one of the first motion pictures shown in Chicago.

'TILL DEATH US DO PART
(Pilot)

This is a very powerful two-reel domestic drama.

Had it not been for a small legacy left to his young wife they would not have been able to furnish a home, and although after hard study under an old country lawyer Jack Mason was admitted to the bar he would not have had an office had it not been for this same legacy, with which he bought office fixtures. It is also true that had not the young woman slaved and schemed to make both ends meet he would not have been able to continue the practice of law, and finally attain the social and political prominence that he did; because if the retainer fees he received during his early practice of law had to be depended upon there would not have been any story to write. His success was due not solely, but nearly so, to the self-sacrifice and hard work of his wife. Many a time Jack was discouraged and ready to throw up the sponge, but his wife always met him with a kind word and a ready smile, and it was through her personality and good cheer that he kept on persevering. His first attorney fee was $20, and it was a very happy couple that looked at this fee in the kitchen of their little home. In order, however, to keep up such a dignified profession as that of practicing law it was necessary for Jack to dress decently, so with the intention of getting Jack a nice new suit of clothes he and his wife go to a dry goods store; the suit is chosen and the storekeeper is wrapping it up when Jack says he will pay for it later. The process of wrapping up the suit is immediately stopped, and the storekeeper points to a very prominent sign on the wall which reads "NO CREDIT." The suit is put back into its proper place, and Jack leaves with a very sad face as he has no money with which to pay for the clothes at this time. They go home and Jack is again dejected. His wife immediately hits upon a way in which she can obtain the suit for Jack, and stealing to her room unobserved by her husband, she takes one of her gowns and rushes off to the store where she gives her gown to get Jack the clothes that he needs. Later on Jack has obtained a certain popularity, and while he is attending political meetings and social functions his wife can be seen at home washing socks and mending clothes, and doing everything in a woman's power to make both ends meet, and to push the man she loves further up the ladder.

Several years pass and Jack is offered the appointment to Congress, but objection is made to his wife, who on account of her years of struggle and hard work has grown old and plain, and is not considered fit to be the wife of a Congressman. The political ring call at Jack's house and offer him the nomination if he will get rid of his wife by divorce or otherwise. Before making any answer Jack tells them the story of how his wife made him what he is; of his rise from a poor country boy to his present position in life, all on account of his wife's devotion and privations to push him upward. The men realizing the high sense of honor of Jack leave, and for a few moments Jack is left with his thoughts. In the meantime his wife has discovered a letter written to Jack in which the political ring offers him the nomination if he can rid himself of his wife, and with all her love for Jack she decides she must not be in his path to keep him from going a step higher on the ladder of life, and is about to leave when Jack discovers her and finds that she has read the letter. Taking her in his arms he points to the words on the marriage certificate, "'Till death us do part."

This picture will be released on March 20th.

THE STRONGER
(American-Eclair Two-Reel Feature for March 12th

It was with a great deal of pleasure, not unmingled with pride in the product of the American motion picture studio, that the writer reviewed the above-named production. Of the American Eclair feature productions "The Stronger" must be classed among the better ones, and may even lay claims to being the best. There is a true, convincing ring to this film that has been absent in some previous productions. Here you have the atmosphere of the North woods, al the fresh charm and simplicity that marks life far removed from the haunts of civilization, all the unsullied passion of the free, lithesome heart. The work of Miss Barbara Tennant in this, as in many other of the pictures in which she has appeared, is, it seems, almost without flaw, and in fact the work in concert of the trio of talented players, Miss Tennant, Mr. J. W. Johnston and Mr. F. Truesdell, is delightfully realistic.

The story hinges around Babbie and the unfortunate passion of her foster brothers for her, which causes bitter enmity between the two men. Babbie became the care of the two young prospectors when she was but a tiny tot. Her father, found dead at the bottom of a mine shaft near his cabin, left written on a slate beside him: "Take care of little Babbie, and God will reward you." And so through the years they cared for Babbie with the help of an Indian girl who made her home with them, until she had grown into a budding woman. Then it was that they vie with one another for her love.

One day a dying miner staggered up to the door, just as Jack, the younger of the two men, was leaving the cabin after a quarrel with Fred. The dying man, after giving Jack a map showing the location of a rich gold vein, expired in his arms. Enthused with the idea of finding a new strike, Jack rushes off to the place denoted on the map, followed by Fred, who has been apprised of the happening by the Indian girl, Reed-of-the-Wind. Following this incident comes the double staking of the claim, a dog-team race for the recorder's office to file a location notice, and then in consequence a duel, which, however, is retarded on its commencement by the bursting into flames of the cabin where Babbie is asleep. By this turn of fate the tragedy of the duel is averted, but in the conflagration, which, by the way, is tremendously realistic, Jack in an effort to save Fred, who has been hemmed in by the flames, becomes temporarily blind, and Fred is severely crippled. There is a fall of the two men into the deep, empty space beneath the cabin, amid tumbling beams and burning timbers, a thrilling rescue, and after all, a thread of sadness in the bestowal of the love of Babbie on Fred, while Jack wanders out into the cold world alone.

THE PORTRAIT

(Edison Release for March 18th)

One of the tendencies of the latter day motion picture product is to give to the auditor at least a grain of food for thought. Stimulation of thought, though not the primary aim of the motion picture theatre, is growing each day to be a more important consideration in the preparation of the motion picture; consequently even the crudest attempt at the filming of the picture play seems to carry with it some attempt to exemplify the better traits of human nature, and to magnify the importance of moral responsibility.

MARC MacDERMOTT

One of the most impressive of the film stories recently brought to our notice is one from the Edison studios, for release March 18th, and entitled "The Portrait." It is a drama of Bohemian Paris, and was written by Richard Ridgeley.

This play is exceptionally strong in plot, and in the great moral lesson which it carries with it. The story of the play centers around a young artist, Paul Le Grand, who in the very midst of a splendid career gives himself up to dissipation and debauchery. Youth and health, friends and happiness are his when he reaches the height of his ambition and wins the "Grand Prize" for his painting.

The fine line between success and failure is too often the vantage point of the devil, and so it was that Paul Le Grand, the center of a worshipful, admiring circle of artists and critics, came near to toppling from the heights to which he had attained.

With his beautiful new studio overlooking Paris, and his man servant to look after his comfort, it seemed as though he had everything that his heart could desire. Nevertheless one thing was still lacking—the woman that he loved was not there.

The young artist loved a beautiful young girl named

Jeanette. Jeanette had the intuitive qualities which every woman has, more or less, and she feared in her heart for the consequences of success which even then were so surely making their appearance, and with rare good sense the young woman replies to his pleading that she become his wife, that it is best that they should wait until his days of dissipation are over.

When she has gone, Paul, sitting in his studio gazing reflectively at a portrait of himself, falls asleep and dreams. His dreams carry him through the dissipations, dancing and women, gambling and wine. Each time that he returns to his studio added lines appear on the face in the portrait. At last the change has become so shockingly great that unwilling any longer to be forced to gaze in the mirror of his debaucheries he cuts the portrait into shreds. The closing scene shows Jeanette returning, having forgotten her gloves. She arouses him, and the result of the horrible dream is that he promises to reform.

The part of Paul the Artist has been played and splendidly interpreted by Marc MacDermott, one of the most talented actors appearing in motion pictures today. Mr. MacDermott is given plenty of opportunities to display his remarkable talent as a pantomimist, while the various changes in the portrait demonstrate the wonderful possibilities of motion picture photography.

Henry Vernot, head of the publicity department of the Eclair Film Company, has issued a statement emphatically denying a rumor that some of the scenes from the Eclair Company's wonderful production, Crimson Cross, were either taken abroad, or from old films. In a letter to the Universal Film Manufacturing Company Mr. Vernot says:

"The writer was to-day visited by an exhibitor who runs the Mutual program in about fifteen theatres. This gentleman said that a rumor is being circulated about the 'Crimson Cross,' to the effect that while the scenes of the Puritan time had been really taken in America, with the assistance of the American Eclair's stock company, the other scenes, representing the life of Christ, have been taken in Europe and even, as some people are supposed to say, bought from another firm and taken out from an old film.

"This is, of course, absurd, and everybody who knows our stock company easily recognizes all of our leading artists in the one as well as the other part of this picture.

"But this way of competition—wherever it might come from—must be fought against and we rely upon you to publish in the trade papers, as well as in your own, a note stating the falseness and absurdness of this rumor."

President S. S. Hutchinson has decided that the breaking of ground for the new Mission street studio at Santa Barbara, California, shall be made quite an event. Some prominent citizen will be requested to turn the first spade of earth which shall mark the commencement of work on the company's permanent studio in that city. It is also possible that there will be some other features added and the people in general will be invited to participate.

The first racing matinee of the Santa Barbara Driving Club over the newly opened Gellespie speedway was held last week. The ponies in the two quarter-mile dashes brought the crowd to its toes. Carl Morrison, one of the riding Cappo, won in 22 seconds. Lee Jones ran Cecil second; while A. F. Burrel on Galvin de Lis was third. The special race between five of the "Flying A" cowboys was a hummer. Fred Ihlenstein on Kid won in 29 seconds. Chick Morrison started the bunch and then joined in the race, dashing into second place with Cota. The race was a beauty.

Opie Read, the novelist, who recently played the part of Jasper Starbuck in a dramatization of his famous play, made by the American Film Manufacturing Company, is the recipient of an enormous increase to his usually heavy mail as a result of his work in that picture. Mr. Read, who is now touring the country on his Chautauqua lecture circuit frequently finds evidence of enterprising theatre proprietors who arrange to show "The Starbucks" while Mr. Read is lecturing in the city. "Thus," says Mr. Read, "I frequently occupy the only two halls in town at one and the same time."

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

The Chicago Circle

THE above is a snapshot of the four charter members of the Chicago Group of Pictureplaywrights. The members are Clarence Frambers, Frank Kramer, Marc Edmund Jones and Maibelle H. Justice. Miss Justice is also a successful writer of fiction. These picture playwrights meet at stated periods, visit moving picture theatres and discuss questions of interest concerning their work. They propose to form a permanent organization and invite applications for membership. Applications should be sent to 4400 Lake avenue, Chicago. Such organizations are sure to promote fraternalism and beneficial instruction. Success to the Chicago group and may the writers of other cities take like action. President A. Van Buren Powell, of Brooklyn, reports every writer in the above group an active worker in the Order of Optimists.

Favors Our Estimate

A Chicago reader says: "I like your estimate of the 'ex-detective' 'high-class criminal' 'saw-mill author' stories that are to come. With all of those who are trying to write, it seems funny that there cannot be a bigger supply of the cleaner stuff. I suppose the new ones can't deliver, and yet the 'schools' and ads are attracting nearly everyone. I was over at Essanay Monday and they counted in 150 on that day, and that for a concern that announced some time ago that it was not buying. Sometimes I think that a serious effort ought to be made to nail for once and for all the idea that anyone can write picture plays. If the deluge continues it will be next to impossible for anyone to get even a start for the firms will refuse to read, save from regular contributors."

The above argument was written by a man who sells a whole lot of scripts during a year's time. There is truth in his argument, too. We deplore the tendency of a few manufacturers to exploit the names of a lot of "dead-ones" as authors of picture plays, while deserving writers who refuse to cast plots in environment of train-wreckers "high-class" criminals, etc., etc., are thrown $20 or $25 for a good clean script. Happily, the better class manufacturers are not doing it. The misleading advertisements of the "schools" have certainly resulted in a flood of impossible stuff, and editors have become heartily tired of reading it. The school "graduate" is invariably self-convicting and there is no market for his work. Everyone cannot write scripts despite the circular letter of the Denver, Colo., schoolmistress who asserts that "every child can write them."

Enter the Poser

And now a new pest has inflicted itself on the long-suffering editors. These pests were sure to appear sooner or later and claim everything for themselves and nothing for the other fellow. But let an editor tell the story: "We have about a dozen guys wearing chinchilla overcoats, flat-roofed hats and silver-headed canes hanging around anxious to swap their dramatic knowledge for a weekly stipend. They are the worst bunch ever uncovered, and are becoming numerous. One of them went to the head of the concern and told him he was a scenario writer, that he had sold $600 worth of stuff the past two months. He caned himself into the sanctum, saw a sample-scenario of the old script 'Mother Love' on my desk and announced he was the author of the story. I timidly told him I had always supposed Mr. Giles H. Warren wrote it, and he said, 'Tut, tut.' The first day out he stated that he had written four of the stories that I always had a well-grounded idea that I had ground out, and then it happened. It is rumored that several of these posers are in an argument as to which one wrote the Bible."

The moral of the above is that the men and women who are selling do not rush into editorial departments making claims, or into print stating that they made "$1,500 the first year they ever tried it, and then only worked half the time." The poser in any walk of life is invariably the counterfeit.

"Moving Picture Rights"

We have noticed some comment on the question whether the magazines are holding out "moving picture rights" when they purchase a story. Most of them are. The Frank A. Munsey Company publishes a string of magazines. As an example, we will read you the waiver printed on the backs of their checks, one of which we received yesterday for a story.

> By endorsement of this check the payee acknowledges in full for the following: One story entitled: ———, which the payee has sold to the drawer with warranty of authorship and ownership, and with authority to copyright, and all other rights whatsoever therein. Any alteration of the above clause makes this check void.

When you sign a Munsey check you waive all rights to your story, and this includes moving picture rights. If you are not satisfied do not sign the check.

Back to Gotham

Horace Vinton, editor and script writer has resigned from the "A Call of the Heart Company," and hastened back to Gotham to negotiate with several first-class picture concerns wishing his services as director.

Nothing In It

A reader sends us an advertisement which urges all "ladies and gentlemen of refinement to take advantage of mail instructions for moving picture positions." One cannot teach moving picture acting by mail any more than moving picture play writing can be taught by correspondence.

Janitors and Plumbers

"If you know of any janitors or plumbers, hod-carriers or bricklayers, out of employment send them along, they will instantly be hired at fancy salaries as scenario writers."

"Just a little sarcasm from a successful and prolific writer of picture plays. It seems a fact that anyone with a line of hot-air and a high hat can breeze into a New York clearing bureau, and get a position as a "staff writer.' And then, too, all the ex-detective and melodramatists in the country are being exploited and, while their names are being tacked to scripts, someone drawing a small salary furnishes the brains to write the script. Some of the best writers in the contract line are resenting such conditions and something may drop at any time. It is even asserted that staff writers for a concern we have in mind are compelled to punch a time clock every morning. The bosses must be laboring under the delusion that they are conducting a boiler factory. There is another class of manufacturers who have a better system.

We Cannot Find 'Em

We are having more than our share of those personal letters containing the sentence: "Stamps enclosed for reply." And we fail to find the stamp. We are pleased to answer all letters providing a stamped self-addressed envelope is enclosed. Observe the rule, please.

Spread the Glad Tidings

Aladdin rubbed the lamp and saw all kinds of things. The script writers employed by a combine are compelled to see all kinds of things by punching the clock. Here is the official lament:

" Spread the news over hills and dales
And to hear our message flock.
We have to write 'bum' scripts all day
And at evening punch the clock."

Remember the Maine

We remember the Maine and several other states when we state that none of "the scenario companies" (a new one) will consider scripts "based on poems taken from a book of copyrighted poems."

Tennyson, Whittier, Longfellow, Scott, and many of our best poets, both ancient and modern, are dead. James Whitcomb Reilly is about the only one left and he has use for his poems. You "poets" might write to Alfred Austin, but his stuff does not always come under the class of poetry. All jokes aside, leave copyrighted stuff alone. We know one contract writer who is going to get into serious trouble sooner or later for swiping copyrighted stuff and rewriting the basic idea. One magazine editor has the goods in cold storage right now, and is patiently awaiting release day.

Golden State Observations

From California—the Golden State—habitat of the bandy-legged Indian, of the three-reels, comes a letter. The writer thereof lives in Los Angeles and his letter follows:

> I usually find myself a bit too busy to give much time to letters. It has always seemed to me that literary workers who gave too much time to letters on the work, and the like, were perhaps not doing much at the business. It's easier to talk shop than to turn out salable material. I wish to make a comment, however, suggested to me by your article on Mr. H. G. Plimpton, of the Edison Company. I haven't the pleasure of knowing Mr. Plimpton, but if what you say is anywhere near correct, I think you should push such articles to the limit. Such men are badly needed in this art. They are all too few. Before I took up picture play work I was a magazine writer—and am now, for that matter—and the contrast between the treatment accorded writers by picture play editors and magazine editors is striking. Not only that, but one who knows a business letter when he sees one, and one written by a man of education and literary ability, some of the correspondence of the arbiters of our fate in the film world is simply "fierce." What is such a writer to think when he receives one of these illiterate communications, and know the writer is the one who is to pass on the merits of his manuscripts? He sees at a glance that the writer is his inferior in all things literary. When will the motion picture industry wake up to the fact that the scenario is the very backbone of the art? A few companies have awakened, I am happy to say, and the rest are apt to wake with a shock when the sales begin to dwindle. I am rather new in this game, as I intimated, but deeply interested. I am doing very well financially with scripts, and personally I deal with a man who accords me every courtesy and shows business ability and education. I have dealt with the other class, to my sorrow. For the general uplift of the art, can't you suggest some way to make the average manufacturer see that he must have capable and well-paid men in the scenario departments.

The average manufacturer occasionally has capable men illy-paid and incapable writers handsomely paid. You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear, is an aphorism peculiarly appropriate to the average manufacturer. It is the manufacturer, above the average, who surrounds himself with well-paid talent and refuses to release pictures exploiting the accomplishments of "high-class criminals." We are happy to inform our Los Angeles friend, that the majority of the script departments are above the average to-day. We paid a tribute to Mr. Plimpton's methods recently, and can also pay compliments to the methods in vogue at the Lubin, Vitagraph, Essanay, Thanhouser, Eclair, Majestic, Reliance, Selig and many other studios. Script editors will go further for contributors than most of the magazine editors, despite the statement of the Los Angeles writer. Recently we conceived what we thought an original idea. We presented it to three magazines. Just one editor replied, although return postage was included in the letters. We know that the script editors would have been more prompt in acknowledging. If Los Angeles is new at the game, as admitted, isn't he roaming rather far afield in "seeing at a glance that this or that editor is his inferior in all things literary." Maybe a rejected script prejudiced him. The incapable script editor is now a rarity; bad judgment in the editorial department can frequently be traced to the "enterprising" manufacturer; the far-sighted manufacturers are awake to the editorial departments and, consequently, better scripts are the result. The majority of the script editors are broad-minded men and women, heart and soul with their work, laboring for better things and incidentally for better scripts. There are, of course, exceptions to every rule, but the exceptions are becoming mighty few in Filmdom. Los Angeles illogically states: "I am dealing with a man who accords me every courtesy and shows business ability and education." Los Angeles will find nearly all possessing like qualifications. As to the other kind, why let 'em alone. As to the letters, blame that on the stenographers. And in passing, the personal letters of literary stars are frequently deceiving. A diagram was necessary to read Horace Greeley's script; we tried to read a letter written by Booth Tarkington the other day, and it was hard work; Thackeray's script was bad, and so it goes. The script editor is a combination of proofreader, make-up man, managing editor, special writer and headliner. He is also a stage manager and walking encyclopedia and as patient as Job. He cannot suit every one although he tries very, very hard.

Pertinent Pointers

Be logical.

Do not force a situation.

Please do not try to be funny.

Revising is difficult work. There is not enough of it done.

It is a very easy matter to overwrite.

Be content with writing a picture play script. Do not undertake to stage it.

When writing comedy try and make the editor see and not guess the humor.

It is said that Jeffrey Farnol has refused to ever sell another serial before it is written. He likes to revise, boil down, tear up and start the revision all over again. He is a successful writer.

Read every publication that pertains to moving pictures and study the stories of the releases.

Avoid too many consecutive scenes and do not worry about casting too many scenes. Let the yarn develop a punch.

The Writer's Prayer

And let us conclude with Van Dyke's plea: "Help me to deal very honestly with words and with people, because they are both alive. Show me that, as a river, so in writing, clearness is the best quality and a little more that is pure is worth more than much that is mixed."

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

GAUMONT FEATURE FILMS

The Prince Feature Film Company, of Philadelphia, will henceforth handle the Gaumont state right feature films in part of Eastern Pennsylvania, Southern Jersey, Maryland, District of Columbia and Virginia. American Feature Film Company, of St. Louis, has purchased the Gaumont features, "The White Glove Band," and "The Race for the Millions." The M. & F. Feature Film Co., of Chicago, is making preparations for heavy bookings on the Gaumont hand-colored, two-reel feature, "By Design of Heaven." The Imperial Feature Film Company, of Pittsburgh, will cease buying Gaumont feature films for the time being. Their last Gaumont purchase is "The Race for the Millions." The Gaumont sales department is making arrangements for the handling of its feature output in Western Pennsylvania and West Virginia. The Buckeye Film Company, of Ohio, has had success with its animal feature, "In the Claws of the Leopard."

A MASTERPIECE NOT TO BE RELEASED

A peculiar instance came before picture reviewers during the past week, which is perhaps without parallel in the history of the moving picture in America. A masterpiece from across the seas, from the Itala studios at Torino, Italy, which startled the critics and elicited an abundance of warm admiration for the great character actor, Zaconi, is, we understand, not to be released.

Harry Raver, manager of the American branch of Itala, in his wisdom of action and willingness to abide somewhat by the opinions of others, submitted the picture to the Board of Censors and to representatives of the press, for advice as to the judicial handling of this truly remarkable film. There was a diversity of opinion on the part of those present at the said exhibition, which resulted, evidently, in the overruling of the minority by those of the opinion that the film, though one of the greatest film masterpieces ever brought to this country, in the marvelous quality of its pantomime, was not of a type to be exhibited in the generality of theatres.

The story of this film is a well-written drama, produced in three reels. It is based on the horrors of that dread disease, tuberculosis. The central figure is a retired army surgeon, who contracts the disease through the bite of a tuberculosis infected monkey. In the horror of finding himself hopelessly in the clutches of the malady, and because of his over-anxiety on behalf of his fiancee and sister, he takes strychnine. Every symptom of the disease is shown in the film, and also the terrible spasmodic suffering of death by strychnine.

In the mind of the writer, it is a question whether, even taking into consideration the artistic values of the film, its exhibition in theatres where children and people with nerves at various tensions are frequent visitors, would have been wisdom. On the other hand, two great lessons might have been well taught

COLOR CINEMATOGRAPHY

There seems to be in the air quite a number of devices to produce color Cinematography in the natural colors as outlined by nature. It has been our province to see on the screen several attempts to solve this problem. Kinemacolor, as is well known, requires special films, special sensitizing, and special machinery to obtain its effects. A method of producing colors by the Hochstetter process is very pleasing. The American Colorgraph Co. are producing theirs on a double-coated film, and the results are excellent.

A Russian process which we have recently seen brings very vividly to the eye of the observer beauties of the highest class in color projection. Another process which we will publish in its entirety in the near future is superior to any yet exhibited. It is on a special sensitized film taken with an ordinary camera projected, as also are the last two preceding ones, on an ordinary machine, and any operator that can show ordinary black and white can also show this. These are produced without any tinting or toning after development and certainly show a great revolution in the art he and old Nokomis had hosts of visitors before and after the performances.

HIAWATHA

The picture of Hiawatha and his two friends—Kwasind, the very strong man, and Chibiabos, the sweet singer,—is one of the many unusual scenes in F. E. Moore's all-Indian production of the drama based on Longfellow's poem. Jesse Cornplanter, Hiawatha, is one of the handsomest men ever shown in moving pictures, and can boast almost royal descent, his great-great-grandfather having been the high chief of the Senecas when Washington was president, and was Washington's friend. Young Cornplanter is a mute poet, the expression of his eyes revealing the unspoken yearnings of his nature. While on tour with the Indian players, he has always attracted a great deal of attention and admiration, in fact he is always a real matinee idol. Last summer at York Harbor

The Indian whose sinister face is seen as the disturbing mischief-maker, Pau-Puk-Keewis, is a wonderful actor, and in his time he has played many parts. At times he has done the funeral oration over Minnehaha and his rich voice and expressive gestures made the scene very real even though his language was not understood. And that reminds the writer of the Indians' adaptability. No matter what may happen there is always someone who can step into a vacated place and fill it as though he or she had played it for weeks. It is this quality that keeps them from becoming "stagey." Even when playing before the camera they are natural. When asked about this Mr. Moore said, "At times the very frank admiration of the whites seems to be upsetting the poise of the players; when I see signs of this I change the cast and in a few days the offender is a good Indian again. Old Nokomis is the Mrs. Gilbert of the Indians. Under all conditions she gives a good performance, although she resents innovations and does not like rehearsals. She has played her part since 1906, missing very few performances, and she is always in character." Minnehaha, despite her bright smile, does not like to come too close to the white people, and pays little attention to the many compliments she receives.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Thanhouser

"The Idol of the Hour," for release March 14, is a very prettily staged drama in which Marguerite Snow has an opportunity for some of her best work. The part of the shepherd girl is a versatile and difficult role to carry out, and in this film has been interpreted in a very splendid manner by Miss Snow. The film contains plenty of variety and color in scenic effects, and the story is one of intense pathos.

"Babies Prohibited," for March 16, also from the Thanhouser studio, is somewhat far-fetched in one or two particulars. Some of its comedy is good, and plays around the subject of the prohibition of children in the modern New York flat.

Broncho

"The Pride of the South," a three-reel, for release March 19, is a well-staged story of colonial days. This film has a touch of originality to it, which is becoming rare in stories of this order. The above-named story, however, has a good original plot, centering around a love story, which has been most effectively carried out in the picture.

Keystone

"The Man Next Door" and "Love and Pain" on the same reel, for March 17, do not appeal to the writer. The comedy is much too forced, and the farcical nature in which the Keystone comedies are carried out savor too strongly of an imitation of the poorer class of European farce-comedies.

"The Two Widows" and "Fickle Father" have no greater merits than the above.

Kay-Bee

"A Frontier Wife," for March 21, is a drama of considerable merit—a lesson for the wayward woman in the feminine lead, and a splendid example of a manly and forgiving character in the masculine lead.

American

"When a Woman Won't," for March 17, is a comedy-drama, simple and unpretentious in plot, but well staged and acted. The story is, however, chopped off rather abruptly at the finale.

"The Lesson" is a very prettily staged little drama, which reflects much credit on the "Flying A" director for the clever and satisfactory manner in which he has staged a simple story.

Champion

"The Honeymoon Lodger" is very pleasing in production, in fact, the work of the producer plays the largest part in making this story entertaining and possible. It contains some good dramatic situations which have been made a great deal of by the performers.

"Bison 101"

"Indian Blood," stretched over two reels of film, although pleasing in the most part, shows blemishes both in production and photography that is not up to the usual standard of "Bison 101." In this film the dead Indian of a previous scene is frequently resurrected in the following scenes. Slight oversights of this character are liable to overshadow the better qualities of a film.

Eclair

"When He Wants a Dog He Wants a Dog" is a unique little comedy which has been very cleverly worked out, evidently with pasteboard designs and figures. The peculiar manner of its progression, and the whimsical play of the different designs which eventually resolve themselves into the figures of two men, a woman, a baby and a dog, will no doubt prove most entertaining and laughter-provoking.

"Lizards," on the same reel, is a most instructive treatise on the life and haunts of the lizard.

Nestor

"Forcing the Issue" is very good comedy indeed. The action of the piece is convincing, and it is a laugh all through.

"The Mining Expert's Ordeal," as a drama of considerable merit, passes muster. The story is full of action, and has many tense moment which thrill.

Rex

"Was She to Blame?" is another commendable drama, in which the question asked in the title is answered most convincingly in the negative in the development of the story. The husband spends his forces in drinking. The wife driven to desperation walks away and seeks employment to gain a livelihood; a false newspaper report tells of the death of the husband in a mine explosion; the wife marries again; the first husband turns up, but the man of morals wins against the degenerate. The solution is most satisfactory, and can leave no doubt of its righteousness with a clear-minded individual.

Imp

"The Satchel Game" is one of the cleverest comedy-dramas of recent exhibition. The plot is well worked out, the story quite probable, showing how a rube can be roped in by sharks and shorn of his entire bank account in less time almost than it takes to tell it, and is exceedingly funny.

"Billy Wins"—slapstick and improbable. Why not select good stories in which the fun originates in situations and characterizations and not in foolish burlesques or farce-comedy?

Powers

"The Rivals," produced by H. C. Mathews, a past master in the handling of children in stage work, is a rare treat. Played almost entirely by children, the natural charm and childish spontaneity of the action, and the clever manner in which these children have handled the situations of both comedy and childish drama, is most remarkable and delightful. Mattie and Early, the talented little Powers child actors, are in the lead.

"Ice Harvesting on the Hudson," on the same reel, is instructive and interesting.

Kalem

"Parcel Post Johnnie" is indeed original in theme, and one will take the comedy on its merits of situation and action, although there is no question about "Johnnnie" being overweight for parcel post.

Selig

"A Husband Won by Election" is one of the best on the market. It is a comedy-drama full of thrills It has a splendidly worked-out plot, and is altogether most meritorious.

Pathé Fréres

"The Grandpa" showing the wonderful and beautiful fountains in the grounds of the castle, and "The Valley of Lauterbrunnen, Switzerland" are two beautiful bits of outdoor beauty well worth seeing.

Lubin

"Until We Three Meet Again," in three reels, in one of the finest three-reelers of the season. The story is excellent, dignified in its treatment, and full to the brim with human interest and moral example.

Kalem

"Absent-minded Abe" is just a short little skit, but good. The comic situations provided by the writer of the scenario have been taken advantage of to the full, and the complications arising therefrom are truly funny.

"The Open Switch" from Kalem is tense in dramatic situation, and even though the theme may be a hackneyed one, it has been filmed in such a manner as to hold the interest of the audience.

Selig

"Diverging Paths" though good in part is not specially convincing. The story is good, but its interpretation is not without its blemishes.

Biograph

"A Girl's Strategem" savors too strongly of the melodramatic without requiring to be so. There are some most satisfactory touches to this film nevertheless, which carry with them a simplicity and natural charm that is pleasant to see.

JUST A SHABBY DOLL

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Thanhouser Release)

"OH, my papa's playin' with a dolly!" laughed the the little nightgowned figure at the library door. The father looked up and smiled, but the far-away look in his eyes did not entirely fade. He held out one hand to the child.

"Where did you get the dolly?" she asked as she climbed upon her father's knee.

He did not speak at once and the child took the doll into her hands. "What a funny dolly!" she said. "She hasn't but one eye and her hair's most gone. And what a dirty dress, papa. Couldn't she have a clean dress? Where did you find her? She doesn't look like my dollies nor the ones in the stores. Do tell me where you got her."

The man allowed the child to babble on for a time. Then he said, "Would you like me to tell you the story of the dolly?"

"Oh, yes, please, papa."

"It's quite a long story."

"All right. I won't go to sleep," said the little girl snuggling closer into her father's arms. "Now begin."

"Well, let me see, where shall I begin?" reflected the man, half to himself.

"At the very beginning," exclaimed the little girl quickly.

"All right. Once upon a time there was a little boy who lived with his papa and mamma in a very poor house, for they didn't have much money. The little boy went to school and the little boy's mamma took care of the house and cooked and made the clothes, and his papa worked on houses and things like that.

"One day the boy's papa came home sick. He had been working on a house that was built in a place that was unhealthful and it made him sick. He went to bed and stayed a long, long time and then, one day, the little boy's mamma told him that his papa had gone away to Heaven and would not come back any more.

"The little boy cried, but he knew that crying wouldn't get them any food and clothing, so he told his mamma that he was going to work. His mamma didn't want him to go and she took him into her arms and cried, but she knew she would have to let him go."

"What was the little boy's name?" asked the little girl suddenly.

"Oh, let me see. I think we'll call him Tommy."

"And what was his mamma's name?" was the second question.

"His mamma's name was—I think it was Mrs. Brown."

The child settled down again, content.

"Well, Tommy went out to look for work, and that evening when he came home he told his mamma, Mrs. Brown, that he was going to be a newsboy. And he was very proud of the fact, too.

"It was not very long after that that Tommy's mamma was taken sick and went away to be with his papa and he was left all alone.

"He felt, Oh, so sad and lonely, he just didn't know what to do at first. But a lady who had lived near his mamma told him she would let him sleep in a tiny little room she had if he could pay a little for it. So he paid fifty cents a week and slept in the lady's room and had a warm supper when he went home in the evening and a dish of porridge in the morning. The lady was kind to him and Tommy often thought of her when he grew up.

"One day, the newsboy was running along with an armful of papers, when he suddenly spied a little girl standing on the corner and crying. She was only a little girl, three years younger than Tommy. She had on a lovely, fine dress and hat. I don't think Tommy ever forgot them, for they were so dainty and sweet. He went up to the little girl and said, "What's the matter, little girl, can I help you?' and the little girl looked up into Tommy's face and—what do you think? She smiled at him and took hold of his hand and said, 'Nice boy, you will take me home. I've lost my way, but I'm not afraid any more.'

"Tommy went along, holding the little girl's hand and feeling all tingly over his whole body. He took the little girl to the number she told him and when they got there they saw a nurse-girl standing on the steps looking just terribly scared. When she saw the little girl she took her by the hand and tried to hurry her into the house. But the little girl pulled away and ran back to Tommy, and before he knew what had happened, she had put her little arms around his neck and kissed him. Then as she ran up the steps of her home she called, 'Come see me, nice boy.' That night Tommy did not wash his face before he went to bed.

"After that Tommy went past the little girl's house every time he could get a chance. Sometimes he didn't see her, but lots and lots of times he did. Whenever she saw him she came out on the steps to speak to him. Many times she asked him to come in but the boy was too shy to go in such a fine house."

The child on the father's knee sat up again.

"What was the little girl's name?" she asked.

"We'll call her Golden-locks, for that's what the little boy called her."

"And what was her mamma's name?"

"She didn't have any mamma."

"And didn't she have any papa either, like the little boy?"

"Yes, she had a papa, but he wasn't home when the newsboy went around so he didn't see him."

"And what was his name?" urged the child.

"His name was Mr. Martin."

"All right. Now, tell me some more," demanded the child.

The father continued: "Christmas came in a few months after the meeting of the boy and girl, and Tommy wondered what he could give her for a present. He looked in all the store windows and tried to find something he thought she would like and that he could afford. At last he saw something he thought was just what he wanted. What do you think it was?"

The little girl looked up with wide, expectant eyes.

"It was this very dolly. Oh, but she was grand then—at least the boy thought so. He went into the store and asked the price. It was twenty cents. It had been thirty but it was so near Christmas that the price had been lowered. The boy didn't know what to do, for that was a lot of money, but finally he said to himself that he must have the doll and he would go without any lunch for a week if necessary.

"When Christmas morning came, Tommy took the dolly to Golden-lock's house. She was at the window looking for him and ran out to meet him. And don't you know, her papa was with her and he let the little girl take him in to see her tree. And she gave him some candy and things. And Oh, didn't she hug that dolly! She said she would keep it forever and ever."

The father sat silent for a time, until the little girl stirred impatiently.

"Well," he continued, "time went on and the boy and the girl grew older. The girl was sent to school and the boy began to realize that she would know things that he didn't, so he began studying by himself, with a little help now and then from the kind lady who rented him a room.

"The little newsboy saved his money just as his mother had told him he should do. When he was thirteen years old he had enough to start a news-stand with magazines and things. And whenever he could find time he would read the magazines and he learned a lot of things. Indeed he did. And the little girl came often to see him now, for she was much bigger and could go out alone.

"When the boy was twenty he knew quite a lot of things and he had saved more money, so he bought out a man's store and he had just the nicest little store in the world, with papers and magazines and pencils and ink and marbles and tops and just lots of nice things. He even had a boy to help him sometimes, and then he could talk to the little girl who wasn't little any more.

"One day when everything was just lovely out of doors Tommy asked Golden-locks if she would go into the park with him. She said yes and so they went. They sat on a little bench under a big tree and Tommy said, 'Golden-locks, do you love me?' and she said, 'Why, of course. I've always loved you.'

"Then he said, 'Will you marry me when we are a little older?' and she said, 'Why, of course. I always expected to.' And then the boy said, 'Well, I must see your father, for he might not like you to be going with a fellow like me who is only a little storekeeper.'

"So Tommy saw the girl's father, and I am sorry to tell you that the father told him he could not let him marry his daughter.

"Golden-locks cried and told Tommy she would marry him, anyhow, but Tommy said she must wait until he had more money. So he sold his store and went out into the big West.

"It is growing late and the sandman is coming soon, and so I won't tell you all the things that happened to poor Tommy. He was sick and lonely and he lost some of his money and all sorts of things happened. But in about five years he had made a small fortune in a gold mine.

"Then he came back East as fast as he could to find the girl he knew was waiting for him.

"But what do you think happened? When Tommy came to the house where Golden-locks lived there was a great big sign which said the house was for sale. And there wasn't anybody around at all. Then the poor boy just sat down on the steps and—well, anyway, he blew his nose very hard.

"He went to the office of the man whose name was on the sign and asked some questions. He learned that Golden-locks' papa had lost his money soon after Tommy had gone away and two years later he had died. The man did not know where Golden-locks was.

"Well, Tommy had a lot of money and so he had to do something with it. He met some nice young men and they began to invite him around to see them and their sisters and friends. Tommy didn't feel a bit like going to any of the places he was invited, but he always hoped he would see his little golden-haired sweetheart, so he went.

Somebody invited Tommy to a house-party.

"What's a house-party?" asked the very sleepy little girl.

"Oh, a house-party is a party where all the people stay for several days, or maybe for longer."

"And do they eat ice-cream and cake every day?"

"Yes, or something just as nice."

"I'd like to go to a house-party."

"Well, maybe some time. I must finish my story.

"Tommy was in the parlor one day with the other people who were at the party, when a little girl ran into the room and cried, 'Look, mother, what a funny doll my governess has.'

"Then the door opened and Tommy heard someone say, 'I beg your pardon, but the child has something I love very much.' When he heard the voice he turned and there stood Golden-locks before him. They forgot everybody and put their arms right tight around each other.

"Everybody was glad and wanted to know all about it, so they had to tell the whole story."

"And did they get married then?" was the sleepy question.

"Yes indeed they did and lived happy ever after."

The child's head drooped for a moment toward the father's shoulder, then she sat up with a jerk.

"If they loved the dolly so much, where did you get it?" she demanded.

"Why, my love, didn't you guess? I am the little boy."

"And—and—my mamma is the little girl?"

"Yes, indeed. Are you glad?"

"Oh, yes, yes! Come quick and let's tell her you told me."

As the child fell asleep the parents heard her murmur to the ragged doll she held in her arms: "They love you, dolly, and I love you, too. I'll keep you forever and ever."

BY DESIGN OF HEAVEN

(Gaumont Hand-colored)

Reviewed by M. I. MacDonald

How often we are obliged to appeal to the quaint Dutch backgrounds for the picturesqueness of our settings. There is a strange fascination about the Dutch landscape with its old windmill, its fringe of soft-edged trees, and its rosy, white-capped, white-aproned maids, and wide-trousered youths with their wooden shoon. The sombre quaintness of Dutch interiors, too, has a charm, and coupling unique combinations of color and the richness or simplicity of fabric with the picturesque lines of the Dutch figure set against this quiet solidity of background, there is every opportunity for making a beautiful picture.

One of the most charming results of painstaking effort that could be imagined, has been secured in the Gaumont hand-colored release to be soon forthcoming, entitled "By Design of Heaven." The scene of the story is laid among the lace makers of Holland, and the pretty little drama, from the character of its climax, or near-climax, might almost be termed "The Miracle." The development of the story, and the impersonation of the different characters is most delightful. There is the charm of the simple life, the impetuous touches of youthful passion, and the struggle against odds, to obtain the heart's desire; there are the softer touches of experienced age, and there is a toothsome ripple of comedy as well as the passing tear. The picture as exhibited to the press, we may say, is little short of perfect. To view it is to fancy oneself transported for a brief space to quaint old Holland.

As the story turns, Yolande, the pretty little lace maker, is in love with a straight and steadfast youth of the town. Her father, a good-natured soul, gives his sanction to a betrothal of the two young people. The father of the young man, on the contrary, agrees to consent to their union on one condition only, that as he is giving to his son the sum of 5,000 florins, Yolande's father do the same by her.

It is with much sorrow that this message is received by both Yolande and her father, because of the inability of the fond parent to comply with the conditions upon which is daughter's happiness depends. Just at this time, however, an opportunity comes into the life of the maiden, by which she may, with the aid of heaven, secure the dowry which her father is unable to give her. The Queen of Holland has offered a prize of 5,000 florins, to be paid from her own private purse, for the most beautiful and original design of lace made by one of the lace workers of Holland. Yolande determines to try her utmost to win the prize, and labors faithfully to secure a design which is original and at the same time beautiful. Disheartened and dissatisfied with the results of her labors, she decides to appeal to the patron saint for help, and at the first opportunity wends her way to the church and prays for the accomplishment of her desire.

That night a miracle takes place, by dint of which Yolande is aided in her mission. Awakening in the night she sees outlined on the center panel of her bedroom window a most beautiful design of lace, such as she has never seen before. Arising from her bed with all speed, lest the vision vanish ere she has time to reproduce it, she quickly and deftly copies it off.

Speaking not a word to anyone of the wondrous miracle, she works night and day until the beautiful lace bit is finished. And so great is her delight when the announcement that she has won the prize reaches her ears, that she swoons. Yolande had worked very hard, but each stitch was weaving the web of her happiness, and the pretty little drama ends with a wealth of joy that does the heart good to look upon.

Here is a picture that the heart, and the eye, and the soul drink in, as a refreshing draught, because it is beautiful, and pure, and good.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

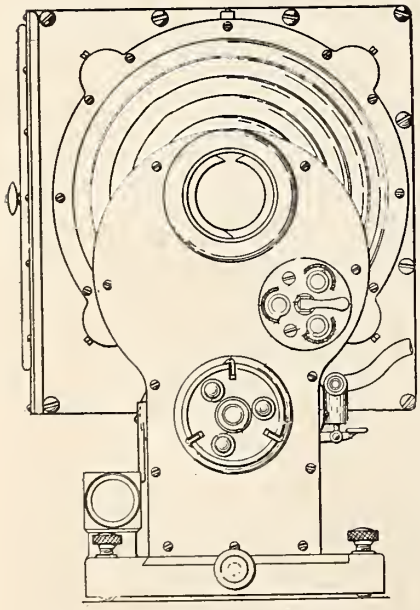
An interesting and important decision has been rendered by Judge Ray, of the United States District Court, Southern District of New York, in the case of the Waltham Watch Company vs. Keene, in which the watch company alleged infringement of certain Letters Patent owned by it by reason of the violation of a certain so-called license agreement or restriction as to the resale of watch movements and which sought to fix the price at which such movements should be sold by dealers.

Referring to the fact that the patent law gives a patentee the sole and exclusive right to vend the article covered by the patent, the learned judge remarks:

"It does not seem to me that the patent statutes goes beyond this, as to vending, and confers on the patentee, when he exercises the right to vend and does vend, that is, sell, the right to attach to the article in the hands of subsequent purchasers a limitation that it must be sold for a price fixed by the patentee or his assignee.

"I am unable to draw any distinction between the extent of the rights which the copyright law gives to the owner of a copyright and the extent of the rights which the patent law gives to the owner of a patent so far as sales are concerned. Each is given the sole and exclusive right to vend."

Thus following the trend of recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that where a patented article is sold and the patentee by such sale receives his full consideration or compensation or tribute for his invention, it was held in the present case that a subsequent sale at a price less than that fixed by the "contract of sale" accompanying the article is not an infringement of the Letters Patent thereon.



The development of the art of color photography has been long and tedious, although especially fascinating, and every contribution thereto is of interest. Hence we note the issue of Letters Patent No. 1,051,591 to William C. Huebner, of Buffalo, N. Y., for a camera for photographing colors directly from the object by one or several exposures for each color, either upon different portions of the same negative or upon separate negatives. The illustration represents a front elevation of the camera which, in its most complete form, comprises the following mechanisms: Shutters having an actuating mechanism which can be adjusted to regulate the duration of each exposure. An iris diaphragm having a controlling mechanism which can be adjusted to regulate the opening of the diaphragm for each exposure. A multi-color filter comprising a suitable number of individual color filters, usually three, mounted in such manner that by a rotary adjustment of the filter frame the individual color filters are brought in line with the optical axis and are held in that position during the exposure. A fractional screen having its area composed of minute transparent and opaque units, arranged in groups or sets corresponding as to the number of units with the number of colors and distributed around a common center in such a manner that by a rotary adjustment the screen can be turned from one position corresponding with the position of one group or set of units to another position corresponding with the position of another set of units, thus exposing in each position of the screen only those portions of the sensitized surface which lie opposite transparent units and protecting the remaining portions of the sensitized surface which are covered by opaque screen units. A holder for the sensitized plate or surface which may be movable toward and from the screen in order to prevent the sensitized surface from being scratched or marred by the rotation of the screen. Automatic mechanism for moving the different movable parts of the camera to the position for exposure in the proper order or sequence and holding them in the adjusted position during the exposure. The patent is assigned to the Huebner-Bleistein Patents Company, of Buffalo, N. Y.

In spite of the amount of "wind" contributed by inventors and their attorneys, the entire Patent Office force of 939 persons, collectively and individually, constantly clamor for more air and breathing space, but apparently without avail insofar as airigate Congress is concerned. The available space in the present antiquated quarters is totally inadequate—"quarters" in fact being an appropriate designation in that the area is only about one-fourth of that requisite for the proper transaction of business—the examining corps particularly being "quartered" like herrings in sardine boxes.

Ralph E. Rorabeck, of Lavina, Montana, is the recipient of Patent No. 1,051,518, which relates to Film-Drying Racks, and the object thereof is the provision of a rack in which a plurality of films of different sizes may be supported at the same time. The device consists of a frame comprising a lower bar, an upper bar, and end bars, spaced parallel bars mounted in said frame between the said end bars, clamping means secured on the said lower bars between said parallel bars the said parallel bars being formed with longitudinal grooves therein, clamping members slidably mounted in said grooves, said clamping members comprising two sections hingedly connected together, means for securing one end of the film between said sections, and means for holding said clamps in adjusted position.

Supreme Court of the United States has recently decided that the common law copyright of the owner of an unprinted and unpublished play is not lost by performing it publicly on the stage and that even the public performance in England of an unprinted and unpublished play by English actors will not deprive the owners of their common law right in the United States to protection against the unauthorized performance of a copyrighted adaptation substantially identical with the original play. although in England, by statute, the first public performance of a play is deemed equivalent to a publication—destroying all common law rights thereto. (Am. Law Review, Vol. 47, No. 1.)

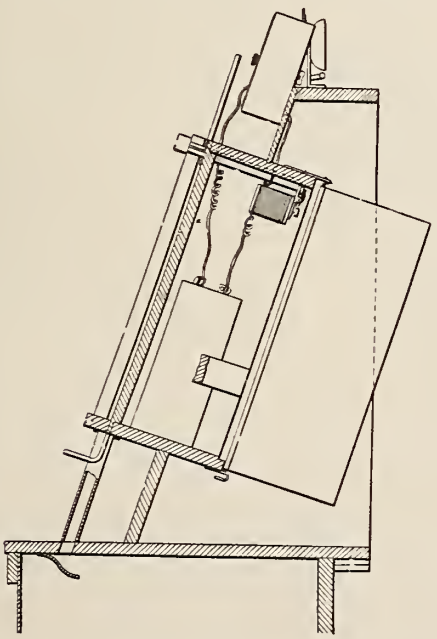
Another patent of interest relating to photographic printing is that issued to Nelson De Clark, of Jersey City, N. J., No. 1,051,700, the object of which is to provide a stand-machine in which the sensitized paper is exposed to the light of electric lamps for certain periods, the time of exposure being automatically regulated and certain signal lights being provided to indicate the length of time which the print has been exposed when the printing lights are shut off. The inventor claims the combination with a box mounted on legs and having troughs at each side, of a top with openings, a lid for one of the openings, means for closing the lid, an electric circuit, a switch in the circuit, a treadle adapted to close the lid and the switch, a movable box with lights, a scale, an indicator adapted to be moved around the scale and carry a contact point in the circuit, a movable finger adapted to engage the contact and also in the circuit, an electromagnet adapted to release the finger when the treadle is operated, an electromagnet energized when the finger makes contact, clockwork operating the finger, a pulley operated by the armature of the last electromagnet to return in the finger to its starting point, means for cutting out the lights when the contact is made, a numbering stamp automatically operated when the lid is closed, and a roller for inking stamp when the lid opens.

"The patent owner, like the owner of any other property. cannot be compelled to part with his own except on inducements to his liking."

Victor Talking Machine Co. v. The Fair, 123 Fed. 424.



In these days wherein "efficiency" is the great desideratum, and the saving of time and exertion count for much in every art, substantially automatic printing from negatives ought to be a subject of general interest. Hence we note Patent No 1,051,691, to Otto C. Courtright and Albert D. Mika, of Fort Madison, Iowa, which has reference to improvements in photo-printing machines, the object being to provide a machine which shall be entirely automatic in all operations except the placing of the negative in position and the placing of the paper thereon, the invention providing for the accurate timing of the printing, the automatic removal of the exposed paper and means for notifying the operator when a predetermined number of prints have been made. The novelty consists in a photo-printing machine, of normally closed means adapted to be opened to expose sensitized material, a presser board, a latch member carried by the presser board, oprating mechanism for the normally closed means having a member in the path of the latch member responsive to the movement of the latter to the latched position for opening the normally closed means, another latch member for holding the first named latch member in the latched position, electromagnetic means for releasing the latch, and a time mechanism for causing the energization of the electromagnetic means at the expiration of a predetermined time limit.

MAKING POSTERS THAT PULL BUSINESS

By John B. Clymer, Manager Sales and Advertising, Gaumont Company

"You won't have to send the subject for screen examination. We've seen the 'paper.' A subject that inspires such posters speaks for itself—in four colors plus brain gray." This was a letter written by a feature film company. It signifies the importance of posters.

There are many forests and oceans of ink used every year in the making of lithographs for motion pictures, which lithographs are not worthy of the presses. They mean nothing. or if they do mean anything, this meaning is so skilfully obscured that their message might well have been the enigma of the Sphinx in point of insolubility.

From a journalist's viewpoint, a poster is similar in duty to a newspaper headline. The whole story or its main point should be there. It should be comprehensive. Of course, there is a possibility that lithographs are meant to be enigmatical and designed to arouse the innocent bystander to such a degree of curiosity that he simply cannot resist walking to the cashier's office and going inside to find out what it really all means. It is the writer's thought that if subjects are good enough to show to millions of people, that these subjects should be so rich as to suggest at least one good poster and that it should really mean something.

The use of text at the bottom of the poster much helps in explaining the import of the attitudes of the characters. Indeed, the use of this text with well conceived and well executed art effects can impart the gist of the whole story and convey it so strikingly and significantly that the spectator becomes more or less interested in seeing the film.

The use of detail is as important in making poster sketches as in the production of dramatic scenes and David Belasco effects can be obtained without hard straining. To illustrate: there was the subject "When Her Love Grew Cold." To one side of the poster is a garden of rank vegetation. A sign "Widow's Weeds," indicates the condition of the woman who stands reading a note. In the right foreground is a Cupid standing on a cake of ice. Cupid is warmly bundled up with furs, mittens, etc., and looks as though an oil stove would not come amiss.

It may be asserted that motion picture audiences are of crude intelligence and that they cannot recognize good posters from bad and that to their eyes a soap advertisement has as much value as a Murillo. The writer, however, is not so prone to take this negative view of the intellectuality of the masses of American people. He believes that though they can not always appreciate the technique of the poster and are not able to tell themselves or others just how or why it is magnetic to their nickels or dimes, yet they can feel that it has "appealed" to them.

There is probably no better way of getting your conceived fluid thought on the brush of the artist than by sitting at his side, looking him between the eyes and talking the subject to him. This is the method of Mr. H. Z. Levine of the Solax Company. The writer, however, largely depends upon presenting to the artist two or more pictures. One is the photograph of nimble words which graphically, specifically draw the curves and angles of his mental image. The others are still pictures of the subject which give the artist ideas as to the real expressions of real faces, not hackneyed, hand-made creations of feature fancy in its dotage.

To illustrate the progress of poster principles and ideals, it is now conceived by George J. Cooke, President of the Metro Lithograph Company, to create a Service Department, which Service Department would co-operate with the poster designer in suggesting ideas for the poster accentuating the essence, the spirit and the life of the subject. Such a department would be of value.

It is in the feature film business particularly that posters pull business. It is hazardous to ship prints across a continent, and it is much more desirable to market the prints on the selling strength of the lithographs. Lithographs, therefore, have a three-fold mission. They should help to sell the prints to the state rights buyer; help to rent the subject to the exhibitor, help the exhibitor to fill his house. It is certain that a good feature can be damned by its paper and that a mediocre feature can be saved by its paper. Therefore, when a good feature is provided with excellent paper, somebody will have to buy an additional cash register.

There is a disparity in opinion as to the comparative advantages or disadvantages of having a few or many figures. The writer in this tends to be governed by his subject, leaning, more or less, to his bias for a few figures. His theory is that one, two or three figures will be of the size to give force—that the presence of many figures will blur the impression on the spectators' eyes.

In the matter of features, the writer believes the three sheet is most important, there being more of these used than of sixes. Consequently he uses his strongest scene, if consistent with the requirements of cubic surface, on the three sheet. Six sheets are the best adapted for ensemble scenes and one sheet for symbolizations.

It was said of a Bible character of ill-fame, that it would have been better had he hung a millstone about his neck and had jumped into watery depths. It is hoped that designers of motion picture posters will find the load of meaningless stereotyped men, women and things on the lithographer's stone to gradually grow less of a weight around his perfectly good neck.

A new moving picture theatre will open for business at Falls Creek, Pa., Saturday, March the 15th, under the management of J. W. Stone. The new theatre will have a seating capacity of 275 and will use vaudeville, illustrated songs and Feature Films.

Kathleen Kerrigan, sister of Jack Kerrigan, leading man of the American Film Manufacturing Company, who is playing in "Everywoman," relates an interesting encounter in a department store in Galveston, Texas, where Miss Kerrigan is playing. She observed an open-faced locket suspended about the neck of a pretty young woman buying merchandise.

"Whose picture is that?" Miss Kerrigan ventured.

"That's my sweetheart," replied the young woman without hesitation.

"Indeed," replied Miss Kerrigan. "I also am in love with him."

For an instant hostilities impended. The young woman straightened up. And then Miss Kerrigan added sweetly, "For he's my brother, you know." The result was a visit at the young woman's home and the topic of conversation you can easily imagine.

GAUMONT

THE LURE OF THE LORELEI (March 25).—Delilah, an adventuress of the time of Louis XVI, is a much-sought woman. To one of her receptions comes Raoul Champlain, a cavalry officer, who is soothed by the sensuous song of the siren. He has no objection to making a little love to her. She reciprocates. He shows her a letter from his mother which inhibits his remaining with her. It reads "Everything is in readiness for your wedding. Your betrothed and I are equally impatient to see you." "Thou shalt have no other goddesses before Me," says Delilah.

Her charm is so potent that when the officer does go to his home to be married, he is gloomy and distraught, and at the moment of the tying of the connubial knot, he flouts the bride-elect and refuses to go on with the ceremony. The unfortunate girl pines under the woe of a woman who has loved not wisely but too well. Her health fails.

The bewitched officer returns to Paris and enters his charmer's house. Then comes the harsh note in the Lorelei's song. He finds her returning the caresses of another man. There is a duel in which Champlain is wounded. Meanwhile in the country, his mother has in vain attempted to stem the tide of the life of his fiancee that ebbed under the sorrow.

Champlain, his wound nearly healed, seeks to atone for his cruelty. He writes to his mother: "Madly did I act and now I suffer for it. I want to do all I can to repair the evil I have wrought. I am returning to ask forgiveness." He follows the letter before he could have had time to receive an answer. All is silent and still on the maternal threshold. There is none to greet him. As he stands by the window looking out upon the snow under the sullen wintry sky, he hears solemn funeral bells tolling in the tower. A few moments later, passes a black shrouded bier. By its side his mother walks weeping. The dead face ont he bier was that of his fiancee whose heart he had crushed.

Months pass and the mother is living with her son in Paris. The hours grow late and he has not come home. She finds a letter from Delilah, with whom Champlain had become reconciled. It reads: "Well do I see that you love me not. To refuse to buy me the jewel for which I so much long is heartless, particularly as you control the regiment's finances. Bring it to-morrow.

The mother realizes that this is the last step in her son's degradation. She goes to the apartments of Delilah, whom she finds in the center of many admirers. In her black-gowned figure, with its black veil, the mother is a forbidding figure amid the scenes of revelry. At her beckoning, Delilah follows her into a room where they may be alone. There the mother begs and implores that Delilah give up her son, that Delilah no longer hypnotize him into deeds unworthy of him and of his name. The adventuress laughs and tells the mother to be gone. A dagger flashes in the outraged parent's hand.

The body of the adventuress is found a few moments later. The mother appears before the startled company. She says, "She killed the manliness in my son. She killed his fiancee She has killed my ambitions and my hopes. It is an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. I am her executioner."

HYPNOTIZING HANNAH (March 27).—Tiny Tim Buctoo had been to the circus and what he has seen so possesses his young mind that when he goes home and to bed he dreams his young head off. In one of the side shows he had seen a hypnotist go through his mesmeric magic, and Tiny Tim, therefore, on the next day decides that next to being a white wing, an organ grinder or the driver of a hearse, he would rather be a hypnotist.

Even hypnotists require practice, and Tiny Tim waves his fingers in front of the cat and the goldfish, but strangely reticent, they refuse to become "hypt." Tim is in despair till he remembers that there is a cook to experiment upon. His hypnotizing also may come to a practical turn and he may be able to hypnotize her out of a plum tart or some "subway jam," he thinks. The cook is a large person with enough complexion to last her a lifetime. Tiny Tim is successful in hypnotizing her, and decides that cooks sometimes have more intelligence that goldfish. He persuades Julia that she is respectively and consecutively a Spanish omelet, a mustard sardine, a mashed potato and a spaghetti.

It is a blithesome afternoon, yea verily, yes, indeed, and all ends happily. No one gets married, no one dies and no one gets a fortune from a rich aunt.

EDISON

MOTHER'S LAZY BOY (March 19).—This is the story of Ben, mama's spoiled child, who grows up to be a lazy boy and poses as a great student to get out of doing hard work that might fall to his share.

His hard-working father often tries to correct his lazy habit, but mother will not allow her darling boy to be abused and invariably shields him until he becomes the personification of laziness.

One day a pretty girl and her widowed mother moved into the neighborhood. Ben becomes smitten with the girl and waits on her and her mother hand and foot. He helps them clean house, wash dishes, carry in coal, in fact he works like a horse, but at home he refuses to raise a finger to help his mother and sister, who are hard workers.

Being anxious to ascertain where Ben spends his afternoons his father follows him to the widow's house and is astounded to see how useful the boy can make himself, as well as agreeable. The young lady's sweetheart calls on her and, thinking Ben a chore boy, tips him for a service. This is an affront to Ben who flies into a rage and gives a grand display of ungovernable temper. The widow and her daughter become thoroughly disgusted with him and forbid him the house.

Returning home his father refuses to be fooled any longer by the boy's pretended studying, lectures him severely and makes him realize his duty to his hard-working parents. Ben having learned his little lesson, turns over a new leaf to prove himself worthy of becoming a useful citizen.

THE DEAN'S DAUGHTER (March 21).—The Rt. Rev. William Wells, Dean of Crosswell, has two daughters. Bess, the younger, a spoiled child, has pretty much her own way in everything. Louise, the elder, is her father's right hand, mistress of the house and general manager. Bess wants to go to London to study art under a well-known master. Her talent as a painter, if she has any at all, is only passable.

Louise, who really has the gift, sometimes gives these two or three touches to Bessie's work that make them possible. One of these sketches that is really more the work of Louise than Bess decides the dean to consent to Bessie's wishes, and the same sketch influences Harry Vane, the London artist, to accept Bessie as a pupil.

This artist is successful and has many pupils. He has a gentle, caressing way of treating the girls and Bessie, who is very much taken with him from the start, being young and impressionable, mistakes his manner and thinks that he is in love with her. This not being the case, and Vane, seeing how matters stand, tells her that she has no talent and that she is wasting her time at his school. This is such a shock to Bessie that she breaks down and returns home in a hurry.

When Louise hears her sister's story she believes that Vane has been trifling with her affections and she deliberately sets to work to avenge her. She goes to London and is admitted as a pupil to the school, under another name, and leads Vane on to fall in love with her. Her efforts meet with success. He shows her his masterpiece, tells her his hopes and ambitions and proposes. This is the chance she has been waiting for. She tells him who she is, accuses him of wronging her sister, and cuts his masterpiece to shreds with the palette knife, leaving him dumb with horror for he really loves her.

Poor Louise is full of remorse and self-accusation when she returns home and finds that Bessie has quite recovered, in fact, has forgotten all about the artist. Louise has to admit to herself that she loves Vane, but now that she has treated him so badly, it is hopeless. However, Bess, for once in her life, thinks seriously of others rather than herself, and takes in the situation. She writes to Vane and asks him to come and see them, and, when he arrives, Louise and he are left alone to explain away all difficulties.

ESSANAY

FINNEGAN (March 19).—Patrick Finnegan, a worthless sort, tired of being bossed by his wife, goes to New York and gets a job on the police force. Deacon Sweet, from the same village, is accused of flirting by his wife. He also goes to New York. Finnegan pawns his civilian clothes to pay room rent. Deacon Sweet pawns his minister's garb, and buys Finnegan's old suit. A few days later, Deacon Sweet is arrested by Finnegan for flirting. Mrs. Finnegan arrives at the police station and creates a scene by mistaking Deacon Sweet for her husband. Mrs. Sweet, jealous, starts a fight with Mrs. Finnegan. Everybody fights. It ends happily, however, when the real Finnegan enters and embraces his wife. This is a corking good comedy of errors.

KINEMACOLOR

RAMBLES IN PARIS.—The film opens with views of the Jardin d'Acclimatation, where swans and other water fowl, antelopes and springboks are to be seen.

A visit to Lunar Park, the great fun-city, follows. Here some excellent views are obtained of the popular amusements, such as the "Witching Waves" and the "Air Blast."

A number of the great parks are next visited, including the Parc Monceau and the Parc St. Cloud. Here are beautiful flower-beds, wide gravel walks and ornamental trees. Another notable and truly continental feature is the large number of statues which are to be seen on every hand. The goldfish in the lake make a pretty picture.

The film concludes with views of the park at Versailles. These photographs were taken on "fountain day,"-when immense crowds congregate to watch the beautiful fountains playing in the park.

A MOTHER'S SPIRIT.—The joyous spirit of Christmas pervades the house where Mr. and Mrs. Ormsby have collected toys for their two little children. A week before Christmas the mother sickens and dies. The father, wrapped in his grief, forgets the children and wraps himself up in his sorrow. The night before Christmas the neglected children slip from bed and hang up their stockings as usual, sure that if papa has forgotten them Santa Claus has not.

During the night the spirit of the mother returns; she sees her babies asleep and noiselessly gets the toys from their hiding-place and fills the stockings, gliding about unseen. Upon the book her husband has left on the table she leaves a red rose, her favorite flower, with which in life he always kept her supplied. Her mission accomplished, she vanishes.

On Christmas morning the children rush for their stockings; the astonished father questions the servants, but they deny having filled the stockings. Then he sees the rose, and knows the spirit of his beloved wife has come back to teach him a lesson. He throws aside his selfish grief and makes the Christmas a happy one for his babies, knowing full well the joy of his conduct will cause the "Christmas Spirit."

The vision of the mother is most wonderfully shown. Through her gauzy draperies as she wends her silent way about the house at midnight, can be seen the objects in the room as she glides by. The illusion is perfect.

AMERICAN

CUPID NEVER AGES (March 24).—Ben Johnson, widower, an old and feeble man, had a pretty daughter, Mabel. The old family friend, Mrs. Ralston, had a son on whom she simply doted, hig, handsome John Ralston.

Mabel took her aged father to walk in the park and at the same time Mrs. Ralston went out for a stroll under the espionage of her big son. They met, and while the young couple spooned, the old could fall asleep with heads together.

A day came when the young pair were married, leaving aching hearts hehind them. And then, one day, old Ben Johnson buttoned up his coat and set forth for the widow's home. It took him five minutes to make her understand just how lonesome he was—then another marriage was performed and a great surprise awaited the honeymooning young couple.

LONESOME JOE (March 27).—An old sailor sat on the heach and basked in the sun. His young acquaintance, Bob Raleigh, came and sat beside him. The old man ruminated, fell into a retrospective mood, and told Bob the tragedy of his life.

As a young fisherman, a party of city folks came to visit him at his cahin one day. He fell in love with Mahel, but, of course, her parents refused to consider such a match. They took her away and two hearts grieved in silence. And then Mabel, growing thinner each day, took to her hed. In delirium she called for him. The parents, roused to the hope of saving her, sent for him. He came, in a daze, too late, and she died in his arms calling his name.

Back to the shore went the young man, going through life with the hope of meeting her again, hasking in the sun, dreaming of the day when he should he called to her side in the greater hereafter.

LUBIN

HEROES ONE AND ALL (March 29).—Jane Smiley has two sweethearts, Jim Dorsey, a husky young policeman, and Jack Barhour, a young fireman. Every day on the way to work she passes first Jim and then Jack. Both men think they stand first in her affections, but Jane is simply leading them on for amusement. She works at the main board in the central telephone office, and one day has a row with a stenographer in the factory office of Fred Jackson. Fred in exasperation takes the 'phone from his stenographer to call down central, but changes his mind when he hears what a sweet voice Jane has. The conversation results in an introduction to Jane, the manager of the 'phone company being an old friend. Much to the chagrin of Jim and Jack, Fred gets ahead famously with Jane and finally asks her to marry him. She hesitates, not being sure of her love. Fred works late one afternoon and lets his employees go home early. A crook has sized up the situation and takes that afternoon as his time to call on an errand of burglary. On the dark stairs he lights his lamp and the match is dropped into some waste. He enters and surprises Fred after locking the door. In the struggle that follows the telephone is knocked over and Jane, who is just leaving, seeing his call, goes back to the plugs and listens at his wire. She hears the struggle, and Fred's life threatened as he is tied and gagged. Then she knows that she loves him, and frantically she plugs the police station. The officer in charge sends out a few men, one of whom is Jim, to go to Fred's assistance. Meanwhile the stairway is ablaze and smoke curls in under the office door. Jane, listening at the other end, hears the burglar's frightened cry of "fire!" as he opens the door and is forced back hy the smoke and heat from the hurning stairway. Crazed with fear she plugs the fire house and Jack, with the engine, starts out for the factory. The hurglar loses his head and is starting for the other door when Fred gets his attention. He unties and ungags Fred and they try for the window. The police meanwhile have found it impossible to get into the building, the lower floor being a regular furnace, and seeing Fred at the window, they shout not to jump as it would mean sure death. The fire is getting into the room, so they dash for the next room and close the door after them. The firemen arrive and begin operations. The two men are forced from that room and have to jimmy the door of the room opposite. The office is now consumed with flames and the hurning 'phone gives its message to Jane, who is carried out fainting. The firemen get up to the office window, but are forced back. The men are now in the hall, but cannot make the rear stairway, that also being in flames, so they burst into the first door they come to which is a storage room with a heavily screened window. Upon this window the burglar commences work and finally cuts the screen through. Fred smashes the glass which is seen by Jim as he rounds the corner of the building. Word is sent to the firemen, but meanwhile he raises a ladder he finds there in order to go to Fred's assistance. Jane arrives and is held hack hy the fire lines. Jim and Jack get to the window and Fred commands them to take out the burglar first. The burglar is taken fainting down the ladder. Fred falls exhausted back into the flames and is rescued hy Jim and taken down by Jack. Upon his recovery, Fred sends the hurglar on the right path and finds that Jane has made up her mind in his favor. The night the engagement ring goes on her finger, Jim and Jack call, but seeing the situation from the window outside, decide to "beat it" and leave the lovers to their own happiness.

URBAN-ECLIPSE—GEORGE KLEINE

AN INNOCENT OFFENDER (March 19).—James, the faithful butler of Mr. Howard, is filing some valuable papers entrusted to his care, when he is suddenly called out of the room. Upon his return shortly afterwards, he discovers to his consternation that the papers have disappeared from the table and are nowhere to he found. Later Mr. Howard, when informed of the matter, accuses the butler, but agrees to employ a detective on the case. The latter immediately makes a thorough search of the house, but without results. About to give up in disgust, he suddenly discovers little George Howard's rocking-horse with its mouth filled with paper. He recalls that a short time ago while speaking with Mr. Howard he saw little George stuff papers into the mouth of the horse, and quickly the whole matter becomes clear to him. Seizing the toy, the detective carries it to his employer, and sure enough, inside they find the lost documents. To verify the clue, they leave the rocking-horse in the room and then hiding behind the curtain and sending for the little boy, they secretly watch him as he repeats the trick. It is perfectly evident now who the real culprit is, and it is not long before the faithful James is restored to his old position of trust in the household.

CINES—GEORGE KLEINE

WHO'S CHAMPION NOW? (March 18).—Bloomer claims to be a great wrestler, and boasts to his friends in a cafe that he can throw any man in the world. At their suggestion, he so annoys a champion wrestler sitting at a nearby table, that to preserve his dignity, the huge fellow is forced to accept a challenge. Bloomer then goes into training and soon develops so much muscle, that his trainer proves no match for him and he is therefore compelled to exhaust his surplus energy in pulling down buildings and other such strenuous pastimes. When the day for the match arrives, little Bloomer, followed by the huge champion, enters the ring amidst the excitement and applause of the crowd. After toying with his opponent for a while, Bloomer finally gets down to business, and, to the great astonishment of all, assembled succeeds in rolling the heavyweight upon his back. Bloomer is now acclaimed as the undisputed champion.

On the same reel:

THEIR COUNTRY RELATIONS.—At the invitation of their Uncle Henry, Arthur Martin and his wife, fresh from the farm, arrive in town for a visit, and for the first time get a taste of city life. Realizations are often quite different from anticipations. At a reception given in their honor, they are shocked at the stories that are told, and the card games prove a frightful bore. The climax is reached when Arthur observes a young stranger paying too close attention to Mrs. Martin. They soon take their leave and hasten back to the farm.

RELIANCE

THE VENGEANCE OF HEAVEN (2 reels) (March 19).—Carl Dian, engaged to pretty Anne Halliday, deserts her almost on the eve of their wedding to run away with Grace, the village belle. This blow breaks the girl's heart and she dies, leaving her aged father vowing that before he, too, is taken, he will avenge his daughter's death.

He takes his revolver and follows Carl into the woods. He fires at the young man and the bullet whizzes by, just over Carl's head. It lodges in a tree hardly five feet away. The exertion is too much for the old man and he dies.

Some time later, Carl, as landlord of some poor cottages, is about to eject a tenant who is unable to pay. This man has an ailing wife, and, for her sake, pleads with Carl. Carl refuses—angry words follow—which are overheard by the servants and the tenant is ejected from Carl's house.

Carl, while walking through his woods, axe in hand, decides to cut down an old tree. But the bark is tough and does not yield to his axe. He places a stick of dynamite in the trunk and the explosion fires the bullet in the tree straight to Carl's heart—the target it was aimed at so long ago by the old man.

Carl's body is found and the poor tenant arrested on suspicion. But a lawyer from New York, working on the ground of the supposed crime, discovers what really happened. He arranges a demonstration, and, before judge and jury and townspeople, he enacts again the tragedy of the exploded tree with its hidden bullet, showing how the vengeance of Heaven was satisfied at last.

This, of course, clears the poor man, who is given a chance in life and his wife started on the road to recovery.

THE GRAFTERS (March 22).—John Hascom, contractor, shows worry and dejection over the condition of his business. A checking of the yearly reports, prepared by his attractive bookkeeper, shows an alarming condition of affairs and Hascom sees no prospect of his dearest wish being consummated.

Alva Bennet, the bookkeeper, occupies a closer place in her employer's mind than that of mere business aid. John has hoped that a good business year will place his finances in a position where he may change his office assistant to his life partner, but his books show such an alarming shortage that John is forced to curb his love declaration to Alva and wait for better times.

Miss Bennet is fully aware of the badly concealed love of her employer and suffers as keenly as he. She has hoped for his declaration and sees that only financial matters are keeping them apart. She tries to cheer him up to fresh efforts in his business, but the man seems to have lost his grip.

Alva shows him an advertisement in the daily paper for a large contract for street work and asks him why he does not bid. John tells her that only political friends of the administration will be considered. Alva, not convinced, persuades him to file a bid anyway and she succeeds in getting him to figure on the work and prepare his bid, which must be filed before three o'clock that day. She works feverishly to finish the typewritten work and get it down to the City Hall in time for the closing of the bids. John smiles at her enthusiasm and knows it is all in vain; he is outside the ring and his bid will never be considered. He leaves the office to attend to outside business and Alva rushes to complete her hastily prepared bid. She sends it by the office boy, who arrives at the City Hall with Alva's sealed document. The clock points to 2:30 o'clock and the boy is refused the filing of his bid. He is told by the clerk that all bids have been received and opened and the contract awarded.

The boy goes back and tells Alva that she is too late. The loyal girl sees the advertised time is not yet up and determines to fight for a fair chance. She rushes to the City Hall, capturing a reporter of a Progressive paper, and drags the surprised man to the clerk's desk, where she demands a chance to file her bid. Pointing to the clock, which points to three minutes to three, she shows the ad in the paper which hold the filing time open till three o'clock. She tells the political friends of the contractor that she will have a fair deal, and the reporter stands by ready to get a graft story for his paper. Alva is sneered at by the clerk and told that the bids have gone before the Board of Supervisors in the next room. She, dragging the reporter with her, braves the supervisors and demands the reading of her bid. They try to set her aside, but an elderly man, noted for his adherence to clean politics, listens to the girl and sees time is not up. He demands a square deal and reading of the girl's bid. The great discrepacy in the price of her bid and the others starts a crusade for cleaner government by an article of the reporter's in the paper, enabling men like John Hascom's type to share in the city's work. The large contract enables Alva's employer to tell her the long-cherished secret and at three minutes to three John Hascom and Alva Bennet spoke the words that made them man and wife.

MAJESTIC

FRAU VAN VINKLE'S CRULLERS (March 16).—Kathrina and her brother Jan bother their mother when she is in the midst of making her New Year's crullers. Each is given a penny and sent out. They buy cakes at the baker's. Kathrina gives hers to a beggar, who eats it ravenously. That night the children ask their mother for some crullers, but are told they are for New Year's. That night after going to bed the temptation to go downstairs and steal a cruller is too much for Kathrina. She goes to the dining-room. She sees a thief enter and hides. He is taking away all the family silver. She stops and recognizes the beggar. She is sorry for him when he tells her of his hungry family. But, finally, she persuades him not to steal the silver. She empties all the crullers into his hat—finally adding to them one that had been laid aside. This one had a little New Year's ring in it for herself, of which she knows nothing. Next day the crullers are missed and all say they know nothing of it except Kathrina. She is blamed and sent to solitary confinement. Her brother Jan steals off to the pond and goes skating. The ice breaks and he is saved by the beggar. The beggar recognizes him and takes the gold ring from his pocket and puts it in a piece of paper with a note to Kathrina. It says she can tell about the crullers as he is safe on his way. Kathrina tells her parents and they praise her for her bravery in saving the family silver.

THE CITY FELLER (March 18).—Henry Allen, a hustling New Yorker, goes to the timber region of Tennessee to make some big purchases of land for a rich syndicate. He goes to see old Ezekiel Burrows, the biggest landholder of the neighborhood, whose pretty daughter, Betsy, makes a conquest at sight. Betsy is beloved by a rough, handsome and unscrupulous mountain fellow named Clay Nash, who intends to gain the girl for a wife and the old man's timber lands for himself. The arrival of the stranger enrages Clay, who determines to show up the city fellow by frightening him and driving him back to the city in disgrace. Henry Allen puts up such a resistance, never lacking his sense of humor, that Clay is driven to desperation, and, with some of his mountaineer clansmen, he tries to murder the visitor. They are told that Allen is a deputy for Uncle Sam, searching for illicit stills, and it turns out that Allen actually discovers one in the back of Clay's place when he escapes from the gang's clutches. Betsy has learned of their trickery toward Allen and comes to the house of Clay to beg for his release. Allen hears her talking with Clay, as he slips away, and believes she is really in love with the mountaineer. Struggling against his own feelings he returns to the house of Betsy's father, with whom he has been stopping, signs the agreement to purchase the old man's holding, orders out his horse and is starting away on his long ride to the railway with her father to guide him. They are overtaken by Betsy, who tells that the gangsters are after them. Then Betsy admits her love for Allen, her father consents, and the three of them ride breakneck to the train in time to catch it and leave the country safe and sound. At the depot they find the sheriff and some of his men and a trap is laid for Clay and his fellow moonshiners. The men ride into the trap, are arrested and handcuffed, to be put in safe keeping, while Allen, Betsy and her father take the train for New York. There the deal is finished between the old Tennessean and the syndicate, whose members announce that their money can hire enough soldiers and deputies to clean up the bad country in the timber lands, while Henry Allen and Betsy Burrows are married with a handsome fortune to start them in life.

HER DREAMS OF YESTERDAY (March 17).—An old lady, surrounded by her pretty granddaughters, tells them of the yesterdays of her life when she, too, stood on the threshold of youth.

She lived down South—and her sweetheart was a young engineer, Bob Grey. His rival, Arthur Deacon, a rich planter, hated the favored suitor and tried in many ways to win the girl himself.

Finding this of no avail, he planned, with the help of his brutal overseer, to get rid of Bob.

As the young man was coming across the fields, all unconscious of any foul play, Deacon and the overseer jumped out and knocked him senseless. This was overseen by a little colored boy, who rushed to the girl's cottage and told her. Deacon had Bob carried to a sawmill and tied to a log which, within a second, would be drawn under the great sharp, whirring wheel.

But the girl and her father arrive in time to save Bob, who denounces Deacon and his accomplice and they are arrested.

Later Bob and his sweetheart are married. But within a few years the young father dies, leaving his widow to care for her fatherless little ones.

This brings grandmother's recollections to a close. "You see," she says, "my yesterdays were not all so happy," and the girls grouped around her offer her their sympathy and love.

SELIG

PAULINE CUSHMAN—THE FEDERAL SPY (March 24).—Despite the eviction of The Hague Peace Tribunal and the diplomatic talk of world disarmament, war was never in fuller sway than it is to-day. In many parts of the world battles are raging and war is daily collecting its grim and mighty toll. The public is fully awake to the situation and is eagerly absorbing everything that is written, spoken or picturized regarding the subject. The Selig Polyscope Company, recognizing the trend of popular thought, has answered it by producing one of the most elaborate two-reel historical dramas ever attempted. "Pauline Cushman—The Federal Spy," is the title of this latest Selig masterpiece. Pauline Cushman, the heroine, was a character unique in the Civil War history. She left her vocation as an actress to act as a federal spy, and her remarkable exploits on behalf of the government twice caused her arrest. Both times she escaped and carried messages of great importance to the federal generals. After the war Miss Cushman was rewarded by the official title of major. The picture faithfully follows Miss Cushman's thrilling experiences and abounds with exciting incidents, elaborate and realistic battle scenes and mammoth and effective interior settings. The scenes of the riot in the Louisville theatre is an achievement in the matter of handling huge stage pictures.

THANHOUSER

THE HEART OF A CHILD (March 18).—He was eight years old, and had been a cripple from birth. His mother, a wealthy widow, loved him fondly, and he had all the comforts and luxuries that money could buy. He was an affectionate little fellow, grateful for all the kindnesses bestowed upon him, but deep down in his heart he feared he was an incumbrance.

No one ever knew how he felt, but he brooded constantly in his childish way. One day while out motoring with his mother, the auto stopped and they both noticed a tiny youngster who ran rapidly by them. Mother and son exchanged laughing comments and then the woman said: "I wish my little boy could run like that," and sighed. Any grown person would have understood what she meant, but to the heart of the child her words conveyed a cruel meaning. He was convinced that she would gladly be rid of him for an active healthy youngster, one who would cause her no heartaches or annoyance.

The mother stopped to attend a reception, sending her son home alone in the machine. On the way he again saw the boy who had aroused his mother's admiration and, yielding to a hasty impulse, halted the car and induced the boy to go home with him. The other chap was a little bit of a fellow, and gleefully consented to change his station in life, when he understood that toys and candy would have an active part in it. The crippled boy brought the other child to his home, installed him in his nursery, leaving a note for his mother, explaining that he did what he did to make her happy. It was a pathetic little note, and it was not surprising that the mother wept bitterly when she read it.

When the youngster left his home he had some vague idea of supporting himself. He found, however, that it was an unfriendly world, and he was not fit to cope with it. Finally, all his illusions shattered, he was ingloriously brought home to be fondly embraced by his mother, who asked him reproachfully, "Did you think, dear, that anyone could take your place?" He is convinced now that no one can.

As for the other little boy he had a "bully afternoon," and returned to his tenement home, the proud owner of more toys than he ever dreamed existed on this earth.

WON AT THE RODEO (March 21).—The proprietor of a hotel in a little California town sent his motherless daughter to boarding school, being determined that she should have every advantage he could afford. He did not regret it, for when she returned she had no foolish notions, but settled down and aided him in his work. When he had difficulty in securing help, the girl insisted upon taking charge of the dining-room, and the old man confided to his chums she was the best head waitress he ever had.

The girl was fond of horseback riding and enjoyed dashes along the country roads. On one occasion, however, she nearly came to grief, for her nag ran away. A gallant cowboy came to her rescue, overtook the frightened animal, and prevented any harm coming to the young woman. Naturally a friendship sprang up between the two, for each saw much in the other to respect and admire.

In that section of the country there is annually held what is called a "Rodeo," a contest of horsemanship, with all sorts of Wild West features. The cowboy was a dashing rider, and on the day of the entertainment told the girl he was absolutely sure to win the prize.

Their conversation took place in the dining-room of the hotel, and, as he passed out, she noticed two incoming guests who seemed to take much furtive interest in the young man. She watched them narrowly, learned enough to arouse her suspicions, and, obeying a sudden impulse, followed them when they left the hotel. From a place in hiding she learned that they were gamblers, who had bet heavily against her cowboy, and to insure winning their wagers had planned to cripple his horse just before the race started. The girl determined to warn the young man, rode all alone to the arena, and was in time to foil the plotters. Her cowboy won the prize, but on the way he won something he valued far more, the hand and heart of the girl who had proven her quick wit in the hour of need.

VICTORIA

THAT BOY FROM MISSOURI (March 28).—Harvey Hamilton was not satisfied to remain in Missouri on the farm, but wanted to "see" New York. So his father sent him to visit his uncle, explaining in a letter which he sent that Harvey was meek and modest and very unsophisticated.

With his carpet-bag, containing his few belongings, Harvey started on his journey, reaching the house of his uncle when a party was in progress in honor of the visit of Dorothy Deane, a friend of his cousin May. Now, Percy, his cousin, liked Dorothy, but she was not a silly girl and just had a good time while visiting her friend.

Upon reaching the house, Harvey did not wait to be admitted, but pranced into the room where all the guests were assembled. His uncle was overcome to see him walk deliberately into the room and was rather cool when he greeted him. May and her brother Claude were also a little cool, but Dorothy was kind and very cordial in her greeting. This appealed to Harvey and he immediately classed her as his friend.

The Hamiltons planned to play tricks on Harvey. First they tried him at poker, but much to their surprise the boy from Missouri had played it before and Claude and his father were glad to make an excuse to get away when all the chips were piled up in front of Harvey. Next they planned to get him drunk, but Claude fell under the influence and Harvey had to bring him home. His folks were furious with Harvey for getting Claude in such a condition. Dorothy had many a laugh at Claude, and she admired Harvey more and more. At last Harvey got up his nerve and made love to her just as Claude was coming in the door. Claude reprimanded Harvey for stealing his girl, but Harvey promptly put him out of the door and took Dorothy along with him into the hall and to the minister's, where after the ceremony was over the Hamiltons found them—but too late. Claude was beaten and the aunt and uncle were overcome, for the boy from Missouri had "shown them all."

ECLAIR

A NIGHT OF ANGUISH (Two-reel) (March 26).—Lawrence Lindsay, a young man who thinks 'tis time to make his way in the world, decides to go into the petroleum-producing line and puts up his all, $500, as an option on some oil lands. Unfortunately a pretended chum, Latham, has promised to advance the balance before the day the option expires. Two circumstances combine to make this Latham his enemy; first, he is the successful rival for Estelle's love, and again, by chance, he has secured the two sections of oil land which Latham knew were O. K. and which he, Lawrence, unconsciously secured. Latham plots Lawrence's ruin, and, after the well is sunk and producing, hires some roughs to set fire to it, just previous to the day the option expires—refuses to advance the money thereon. Ruin stares him in the face, and, despondent, he writes his troubles to his mother and the poor mother reads between lines that Larry contemplates suicide. She hurriedly collects some securities, and by an appeal to the train despatcher, she being a stockholder, arranges to have the train pick her up that evening for Oklahoma, at a little way station not far from her residence. On the way a blow-out occurs. She dismisses the chauffeur, sends him home and walks to the station. The accident belated her and the conductor refuses to hold the express train. As it pulls out she arrives in time to see the train disappearing. She is consoled by the old station-master—that she can get a freigbt train at 5 in the morning, which will land her at her destination at 10 a. m. He invites her to go to his shack and lie down a while. She accepts. As he attempts to pick up her valise she refuses to part with it, and the old man suspect that there may be valuables therein. She lies down in one of the two beds in the room—the old man's wife in the other. He sees the arrangement and, once outside, his curiosity is aroused. He opens the window near the head of her bed from the outside and the cold air awakens her—at the same time, the old lady, who being a good soul, fears that her guest will catch cold, and offers to change beds, which they do—after Mrs. Lindsay has put her valise in a place of safety. The old man, still grumbling at his fate, and thoughts of how much the valise should contain, sits by the front door, and, full of his evil thought, dreams that he rose, entered the house, and after having gagged and bound the woman occupying the bed of the guest, he carries her out and places her on the track and hopes that she will be killed and so badly mutilated as to be unrecognizable. He can keep the valise, etc.; he sits by the track expecting a train; it thunders on, and, just as it is about to hit the body the shock awakens him; he finds himself in front of the hut; there, still dazed and in the doorway, sees the woman he still thinks he laid on the track; it dawns upon him that he has made a mistake and laid his wife on the track; he rushes frantically for the spot and the train dashes by; in his remorse and horror he accuses himself of being his wife's murderer, and is only calmed down by the cheery voice of his wife tapping him on the shoulder, "What's the matter, old man? you must have had a bad dream." "Oh! yes." He realizes it now, and, with a sob of relief, feels that he has had a night of anguish. In the meantime the freight pulls in. Mrs. Lindsay goes aboard after having given a substantial fee to her hosts, and resumes her journey to rescue her son. She arrives in town, hurries to a banker, raises the sum to bind the bargain, hurries to the office of the land company in time to cover the balance and foil Latham, who was awaiting the final moment to expire, and secures Lindsay's valuable holdings—and mayhap, with extra prosperity, Estelle's hand. But mother—her money foiled his amicable desires—and saves her brave Larry. Maybe when she missed the express she had her moment of anguish. The picture is put on with the usual Eclair careful attention.

NESTOR

THEIR COMBINATION SUIT (March 24).—In their third floor back, Eddie and Lee are wondering how they can raise the wind. They see an advertisement in the paper. "Wanted—A private secretary; also a gardener." The ad bears the name of the wealthy Mrs. Van Cortlandt. The boys count their spare change—tbe accent is on the "spare." They go to a clothing store and purchase one suit. It is all they can afford. They toss for possession. The suit goes to Eddie. It is clear that Eddie will wield the pen and Lee the back-breaking lawn mower.

Tbey land the jobs and Eddie and "our daughter" Louise make eyes at each other over the tea-table while Lee and the maid strike up a little flirtation. Both boys make good progress witb their love affairs if not with their duties.

The time arrives wben Lee insists upon his share of the suit and gets it. He goes out and is seen by Louise talking to the maid. Louise thinks it is Eddie and is outraged at his duplicity.

The following morning Eddie turns up for his duties with tbe one good suit on again. He is surprised at the scornful look Louise flashes at him. He is miserable and decides to quit.

POWERS

THE CALLING OF LOUIS MONA (March 28).—Louis Mona, is left to the care of the monks of the monastery of San Luis, wbo have brought him up with love and care. Arriving of age, Louis, who is devoted to his surroundings and who knows nothing of the great outside world and who bas no great desire to learn about it in person, desires to join the order, but there is a rule that cannot be overlooked. He must do as others have done, and travel for a year in the world in order to determine whether he really wants to become a monk. At the end of the twelve months he can be received into the walls of the monastery by applying at the gate at a given bour.

In the chapel Louis kneels to receive the blessing of the good old prior, and tbe monks present him with gifts of food, money and clotbes and bid him farewell. Louis, nervous of the venture, changes his garb and finds himself without the walls of his refuge, free to do his own will. He wanders on until he comes to a place where the roads cross. Which way to take? He decides the question by casting a leaf in the air and seeing which road it blows to. He is satisfied, but before proceeding, he sits and rests and eats frugally.

A handsome automobile comes to a stop nearby. There is trouble which has to be remedied. A beautiful young woman, wise in the ways of the world, gets out, and, seeing the good-looking boy, sits by him and talks to him. She learns his history and finally persuades him to accompany her. He, used to obeying, and wide-eyed at this beautiful creature, goes to the great city with her. She gives him an introduction to her brother, who gives him a position in his banking establishment.

The ways of tbe world appeal to Louis. He succumbs easily to the pleasures which surround him. He visits the girl often, and a great intimacy springs up between them. One day he finds her smoking. He begs her not to offend that way and gives her a little cross, which he hangs around her neck. She is much affected by his counsel and commences to forsake her former ways and to lead a life of usefulness. He goes steadily down and down despite her efforts and the callings of his better nature. Finally comes drink and gambling and ruin—a stage where he cannot borrow. He shuns society and his fellows, but the desire to see the girl is ever present.

One day he passes a hospital for contagious diseases and sees the girl going in, bent on charity. He sees ber do this several times. Then he learns that she has caught the dread disease. He manages to see her for the last time—she dies with the little cross clasped to her breast, and Louis goes away and fights his battle out. He duly returns to the old home of refuge and applies for entrance to the monastery. He is received within to lead a life of holiness and to forget the world and his one big sorrow.

TO RENO AND BACK (March 27).—Just returned from their honeymoon, Jane and King are preparing for a box party at the opera. King, unable to restrain himself at the sight of Jane beautifully dressed for the occasion, takes her in his arms and completely disarranges her carefully-prepared coiffure. He is sent downstairs to wait "a minute" while Jane and her maid prepare to remedy the damage done.

King fretfully smokes himself near to death finding out that a woman's "minute" is an hour, and angrily leaves for the opera, giving Jane her ticket and telling her to follow.

She, incensed, sends her maid in her place, and the ludicrous appearance of the maid at the fashionable box party humiliates King to such an extent that later a quarrel ensues and he leaves home to live in a hotel.

Jane, equally high-spirited, sends him a note that she is leaving for Reno to get a divorce.

By a quick move King makes the same train. He has secured the upper bertb over her, but is driven to the smoker by Jane, who refuses to let him come near her. He follows her to tbe hotel in Reno, but cannot effect a reconciliation.

However, a drunken janitor—a smoky furnace—a fire-escape to which the only egress is through King's room—a cynical hotel clerk and the feminine instinct to rush to the man she loves when in danger enable King and Jane to come together after a trying experience and being boycotted by the hotel clerks of Reno.

IN THE WRONG FLAT (March 19).—While Violet is away from home her husband, the Rev. John Smith, gets tired of boarding and takes up housekeeping. It so happens that Rev. Smith rents rooms in the same house in which dwell a Mr. Jack Smith and his wife, Nora, and this causes much trouble. Violet Smith comes home from the country, goes into the wrong flat, and no one being home, makes herself comfortable. Later she hears someone moving in the next room, thinks it is her husband and kisses the wrong man. Jack Smith and his friend, Harry Rogers, who is visiting him, upon finding out that there is a strange woman present, plan to get rid of her, and while doing so, in walks Nora, Jack's wife. This starts a whole lot of excitement, in which Jack Smith tries to keep his wife from going into the room where Rev. Smith's wife, Violet, is, and Harry tries to stop laughing. This is rather a compromising situation for both. After mucb trouble and many funny incidents, Violet's husband, the Rev. John Smith, hears the noise, goes down to see what tbe trouble is, finds his wife in the other man's flat, and after more trouble and excitement, come explanations which end by the Rev. Smith taking Violet in his arms.

THE WAY OF THE TRANSGRESSOR (March 21).—Margaret Summers is married to Philip Summers, a mean-spirited adventurer, who skates dangerously on the edge of the law. He illtreats her and makes her thoroughly miserable. Finally he gets into trouble with the police, and, returning home, packs up some things in a bag, takes Margaret's earrings from her, strikes her and deserts her.

Forced to do something to earn her living, she obtains a position in the office of Gerald Pribyl as a stenograpber. Pribyl becomes interested in her and eventually seems about to propose marriage to her. She learns of the death of Summers, and then, when Pribyl does propose marriage she feels free to accept him. They are married.

One evening Pribyl is forced to leave town on a business trip, and bids his wife and child farewell. A strange man has been seen hanging about the house. When Pribyl has gone a burglar makes his way into tbe library, where the safe is kept behind a screen, and proceeds to open it. Margaret hears a ring at the bell and goes to the door. Summers walks in and calmly makes himself at home. Margaret is horrified at the situation.

Summers makes his statement brief. He wants money, and a lot of it. If he doesn't get it he proposes to wait until Pribyl returns and explain tbe situation to him. Margaret is desperate. Summers proceeds to establish himself to wait, and starts for a table on wbich are a decanter and glasses. The burglar believes he is discovered, and, in a panic, springs from his concealment and shoots Summers dead. Margaret is horrified, but suddenly sees that her problem is solved. She picks up the burglar's weapon when he has fled, and on the arrival of her husband allows him to tbink that Summers was a burglar and that she shot him. Tbe police are notified and remove the body.

"THE GREAT GANTON MYSTERY (Two-reel) (March 27).—Harry Ganton is a bacteriologist, whose exhaustive reaches have brought him considerable fame. Most of his work is carried on in the laboratory of his magnificent home and about the grounds, where he is at present engaged in vivisectional experiments with guinea pigs.

An advertisement for a French maid is placed in the newspapers by Mrs. Ganton. A comely young woman applies for the position and is engaged forthwith. As soon as her eyes fall upon Ganton and his upon her there is instant recognition. The wild, youthful days of Ganton while a student in Paris, are focused upon his vision. The maid, too, is plainly affected, and all the bitterness and anger of her nature seem to possess her.

The maid goes about her work, keeping her own counsel. All the while, however, she is burning within for revenge. An idea comes with the reading of an article on scientific experimentation, which she chances to observe. So, when preparing an orange for Ganton in the morning, she designingly inserts some of the poisonous germs with which he has innoculated one of the guinea pigs and which she has cleverly drawn from the little animal.

Ganton dies suddenly, and the whole affair becomes a perplexing mystery. The case is diagnosed as one of ptomaine poisoning, when Professor Felix Westerly, a well-known scientist and expert on bacteriology, is called in.

Westerly, being of an intuitive turn of mind, begins work instantly. Finding some of the orange peels, he examines them closely. Then going to the maid's room, he discovers the clipping from the scientific paper. Quickly scribbling a note on the back of an envelope, asking the maid to call at his home that evening, he leaves.

The maid finds the note shortly afterward, and, after some hesitancy, decides to go to the Westerly home. Hardly has she become seated,

It is all too clearly revealed to Westerly. He dismisses the maid, and, after turning the facts over and over in his mind, pens a report in which he states he is unable to find any positive proof of foul play, at the same time expressing the opinion that the case will ever remain a mystery.

THE NEW FILM ACTOR (March 21).—Fred is anxious to become a film actor, and, aft[er] screwing up his courage, he makes applic[ation] to one of the producers of the Great Northern Film Company. After being told to return on the following day, Fred decides to perfect himself for his chosen art and demonstrates to his sweetheart that he possesses all the necessary requirements to become famous on the screen. When he returns to the studio he is assigned to a small part, but he manages to make such a muddle of everything he undertakes that he is ordered to leave the plant. The producer is in high rage because Fred has spoiled the filming of three pictures, but this does not worry the would-be actor. He finds his way into several dressing rooms, and, donning a soldier's uniform, fights a duel with a marble bust. Finally, being unable to get rid of the ambitious young man, the producer agrees to engage him providing he lives up to the requirements of the company. These "requirements" include a fall from a balloon, drinking a pint of prussic acid and allowing himself to be run over by a railroad train. An hour later the ambitious young amateur, almost unrecognizable, wanders into the studio. He has fulfilled the "requirements" and is promptly engaged by the astonished and delighted producer.

On the same reel the Great Northern Company presents a scenic subject entitled "The Port of Copenhagen," another of the delightful views of which it has been making a speciality of late.

TILL DEATH US DO PART (March 20).—Jack Mason, a representative in Congress, has achieved great political fame, and the nomination of a senatorship is offered him by a political ring. This ring, however, takes exception to Jack Mason's wife, whom they consider unfit to be the wife of so prominent a man in political and social affairs. They suggest that he divorce his wife, and in return promise that the nomination shall be his. His wife reads this letter, and although she is devoted to her husband she determines that she will not stand between him and his political and social ambitions. She makes up her mind to pass out of his life. At this moment the political committee are ushered into Jack Mason's library. They have come for an answer. Before giving this, however, Jack Mason tells the committee about his early struggling days, when he first passed his examination to be admitted to the Bar; how his wife, then a pretty country girl, sacrificed her little inheritance in order to furnish him with an office; how she toiled and slaved in order that he might be fitly clothed in order to mingle with people in the higher sphere; how her every thought had been for his future. Night and day she had sacrificed the better part of her life in order that he should be pushed forward on the path to success. How she had grown old, plain, and that he had expanded and progressed. It was a story of self-sacrifice, humiliation and abnegation on the part of a woman whose life was wrapped up in that of the man she loved. The committee recognized the man's nobility of character in standing by the woman who had made him the man that he was. They saw their error, and shamefacedly took their leave. The wife is about to leave her husband's roof, when he discovers that she is cognizant of the whole affair. Taking her in his arms he shows her their old marriage certificate, and as he enfolds her to his heart, he points to the words, "Till death us do part."

MEMORIES OF LONG AGO.—Jesse Williams, an old clam digger, finds in the sand while digging clams, an old ring. He takes it back with him to his lonely cabin, sits by the fire and, holding the ring in his hand, falls asleep.

His youth comes back to him as he sees himself waiting outside Mary Randall's cabin to take her to church. Mary and her father come out; the young people exchange tender glances; the girl goes with her father and the boy follows.

After church he meets the girl at the same time with a rival; the girl shows preference for him and playfully steals her mother's ring before going out for a row with Jesse. Unfortunately Mary loses the ring overboard; Jesse comforts her and promises to see if he can find the ring later at low tide. In the meantime Mary's father has found that some miscreant is robbing his eel and lobster pots at night, and goes with the rival to the seashore to discover the rascal. They see in the dim distance the robbers; Jesse comes ashore after a fruitless search for the ring and is promptly accused by the fisherman of robbing the pots. This he strenuously denies, but is warned never to come near the house again.

He meets his girl clandestinely and they go for a walk over the rocks. She falls over a cliff, he rushes down only to find her unconscious and perhaps dead. He tells her father and rival who carry Mary home. They find that she is dead. Jesse is warned away and is not even allowed to mourn over the grave. He returns to the fatal rocks and is bowed in grief.

The lonely old man slowly awakes from his dream of the past, takes the little ring to his breast as the picture fades.

SEAWAIF (Mar. 24).—Before going to the fishing grounds, Granddaddy builds baby Grace a boat. They sail away, leaving her in charge of her mother. The little girl asks her mother if she can go to the shore and sail her new toy. "Yes, but be careful, dear," so off the child goes with her boat in her arms and her chum, Whiskers, the dog, reluctantly pulling on his lead. She gets her toy in the water, the boat becomes unmoored and drifts away. Missing her baby by mealtime, the mother looks out of the window out on the bay and discovers, to her horror, that the boat is almost out of sight, and the baby standing up, waving her little arms for help. The mother frantically runs out to seek assistance; she dispatches a boy to the distant life-saving station, and in the meantime, with the assistance of the priest and neighbors, builds a signal fire on a high rock, with the hope of summoning her husband and father.

The fishermen see the distant fire and row back to shore; the frantic mother tells of the accident, so they tumble back into their boats and row off to seek the child. In the meantime the boy has given the alarm to the lifesavers, who launch their boat in record time and row with mighty strokes to the rescue. They save the child and dog and transfer them to the fishermen. The baby is taken home. On returning to consciousness she asks plaintively, "Where is my doggie?" The dog is returned to her arms and happiness reigns.

THE LIGHT IN THE WINDOW (Two-reel war drama).—Mr. and Mrs. Haley are old-fashioned Southerners, who believe in whipping their slaves when they disobey, and, indeed, for any small pretext. It is part of the day's work. Their little son Richard does not believe in the constant chastisement. It palls upon his sensitive nature. He is particularly hurt when his pal, old Mose, is beaten for real or fancied ill deeds. A crisis arrives when Mose is terribly whipped by his mother and also by his father, and is turned over to an overseer who brutally punishes the darkey. Just previously to this Richard had been ordered by his father to whip the slave himself, and was punished for not doing so. The unjustness of the punishment and the brutality of the whole proceedings determine Richard to run away from home, and he does this, telling Mose that he is going North, where he will not have to beat slaves.

His mother's grief is terrible and it increases her enmity toward the North to an insane degree. She constantly looks for the coming of her beloved boy and each night she lights the lamp and places it in the window, and ever watches and waits, her nervous hands winding and unwinding, her face twitching with mingled rage and hope.

Fort Sumter is fired upon and the most terrible war of history is on. Haley enlists in the Confederate army and is assigned to the duties of a spy. He works northward. Richard joins the Union army and is appointed to a lieutenancy. He is sent South.

One day when he has obtained some valuable information by spying from the vantage point of a tree, Haley crosses the road in time to hide from some fast-approaching cavalrymen. One of the mounted men notes the new tracks, and Lieutenant Haley, resorting to a clever ruse, succeeds in capturing Haley and marches him to camp. Haley recognizes his son Richard, the likeness being accentuated by a scar on his forehead, the same scar caused by the scythe and his own carelessness and which was charged up against poor Mose.

Haley's papers are taken, and rather than have his son responsible for his death (who is ignorant of his father's identity) he suddenly knocks a man down and mounting a horse endeavors to make good his escape. He does not get far, for a bullet stops his career and mercifully ends his troubles for all time. Richard, going over the papers found on Haley's person, recognizes the address on an envelope. An officer hands him a letter which is from his mother to Haley, and which tells him to look out for their dear son; to tell him the light is in the window for him every night and——! Richard is informed that the escaped man is dead, he staggers to his father's body and grief takes hold of him.

That night while sitting over the camp fire in an agony of grief, Richard determines to go to his mother. He obtains a furlough and succeeded in getting near to his old home, when he sees a party of Confederates go to the house. He watches, not daring to show himself. One of the Confederates gives Mrs. Haley the message that tells her of the death of her husband and one passion remains with her—the desire to see the Northerners exterminated.

The Confederates all leave the house and Richard stealthily crawls toward his home, his heart filled with a desire to comfort this poor woman—his mother. Mrs. Haley sees the Unionist creeping nearer. Her face lights with a fierce triumph. She gets her gun. Old Mose tries to stop her, but too late, for she shoots and Richard falls. Old Mose runs out and discovers the dead man to be his young master, but does not disclose his identity to the mother.

Mrs. Haley waits till dusk. She lights the lamp and places it in the window and sits and waits—waits for the son who will never answer the Beacon's call this side of Paradise.

PICTURE MUSIC

ERNST LUZ

A very much argued point in picture playing is that of suggestive playing. Suggestive playing when it is done for the purpose of exciting interest, not to burlesque the picture, is very effective, such suggestion being created by the music not the title of the composition. The more important of the picture requirements, wherein suggestive music is effective, will be found in your characteristic playing or in the use of music characteristic of the different nations' folk songs.

This does not mean that it is appropriate to play a few bars or even a strain of a Chinese characteristic number, when a Chinese cook in a Western mining camp scene accidently appears on the screen. That is burlesque playing pure and simple. If such a cast character were to sing or play an instrument, in all likelihood it would be of a characteristic nature, and at such action a Chinese number would be appropriate. In pictures where American or European characters are cast in Arabian or Egyptian stories with like settings, it would destroy the picture value to follow such characters with an American rag or syncopated number, and would not assist in giving the picture a color. In many of these pictures you will find scenes of modern hotels or others suggestive of the European or American, giving you an opportunity for relief numbers. Were there no relief opportunities in such pictures, it is not probable, were the music properly played, not improvised, that it would become monotonous, for releases of such pictures are not frequent, and when released are novelties and should be treated as such.

In multiple reels this could be overdone.

In a film such as the "Resurrection," which is at all times suggestive of the Russian, all action supposedly ensuing in Russia, it would be foolish to hope that an audience could be interested by a continual playing of the Russian style mazurka or their 2/4 numbers of minor theme and lively tempo. At this point your standard compositions of the old masters and recognized composers are invaluable. Such compositions are known, acceptable and appreciated in all countries, and are always appropriate for the portrayal of the serious moods in all pictures.

By following the light action with characteristic numbers and the more serious moments with standard compositions, you will find your music entertaining as well as creating a necessary color for the picture.

Allow the moods and action of the characters on the screen to suggest the temperamental value of your music, the scene settings and their locale the style or character.

Picture players using a repertoire will find the above rule easily followed, while those depending mostly on improvisation will find it difficult and troublesome.

There is an erroneous idea imbedded within the minds of many competent, yet heartless pianists' that if they catch the proper dramatic and melodramatic situations in the picture the other action matters little. They will prelude, play anything that strikes their fancy, but music, although never missing a dramatic opportunity. While a dramatic number is essential and excites an immediate interest, it is of little value unless you can retain that interest by the use of suitable numbers to follow. To illustrate I will take "Under the Make Up," a Vitagraph release of March 1st. With the exception of a dance the first half of the reel is introductory action, and can be followed by light, melodious numbers.

From the time that the dancer takes the doll from her hand-bag in the private dining-room until the end of the reel requires high tension music. At this point a pathetic number in major key will add to the light agitato which should immediately follow when her acting partner and husband is informed that she has left him, going into a minor waltz theme played slow and plaintively (Oriental style very good for this effect) until wife on stage with husband, then into a heavy agitato, slow tempo, until wife is carried into dressing-room and revived. Take up a pathetic number in major key, brighten the number at reconciliation, or go into slow waltz movement for ending. Note that your light agitato, plaintive and heavy agitato are in minor, consequently creating high tension, the relaxation comes with your pathetic number in major key for the reconciliation. This is a beatiful picture; while it is an old story, it is worked out with an entirely new setting, very realistic and offers excellent musical opportunities.

You will find it very beneficial in remembering that you can better retain dramatic and high tension interest with minor numbers, at the same time giving your major number a more satisfying effect for ending a picture or relieving a heavy dramatic situation. While dramatic and melodramatic, music is used in the staged production at dramatic situations only it must be remembered that the dialogue continues and retains interest, while in the picture the music must replace that dialogue.

Is a dainty little waltz, easy and of staccato style. Shahin-Shah, waltz by H. Smith. Oriental waltz. Legato Minor movement with a sustained major relief. In a College Town, march by R. Browne. A 6/8 march with a good swing and catchy. Dance With Me, hy R. Brown. A march in 2/4 time, that you will like. Heap Big Chief, by R. Brown. An Indian characteristic march or intermezzo in 2/4 time, that suggests hte American Indian style in music from beginning to end. Very good for Indian pictures.

IFS AND HOPES

Have you heard of a concern having the above name? If not, you will get acquainted with them through the Chat of this issue. The firm of "Ifs and Hopes" have been doing a grand business for many years in New York City with the moving picture operators, and they have reaped quite a harvest, in fact, they are still doing business with the New York operators, but not doing as well as formerly. You know this concern better by the name of Local No. 35. The Spotlight Workers' Union alias Ifs and Hopes, and you know they were getting money for five years for a few "Ifs" that they were handing out, along with very little "Hopes" on the side, to the operators who were members of the former auxiliary, and who were foolish enough to walk up to the treasurer of Local No. 35 every month and pay their good, hard-earned cash to him for a few more of those "Ifs." They (Local No. 35) took the coin and turned their heads to laugh at the poor unfortunate victims, whom they led to believe that they were going to get something that really never existed, and something else besides. To tell the truth there never was any such thing as equality, and all the victims did get was the cold shoulder and froze out. Before continuing with this part of the Chat, I am going to tell the readers what occurred last week. Another paper with a projection department which no doubt many picture operators read, had published a letter sent to that paper by a member of the new branch of Local No. 35 (alias "Ifs and Hopes"), giving the picture operators in New York an idea of many advantages they would have if they would join the new branch. You know that the member who sent this letter for publication is a paid official of that new branch, and his salary comes out of the money paid by the new victims for some more "Ifs" and little "Hopes." In the letter published, the writer states that the aim of Local No. 35 is to organize a body of cleancut men, who take their profession seriously. This is pretty fine salve for healthy people, though healthy people don't need any salve, but for the one that does need salve, it is not the right kind. This is what Local No. 35 tells you when they want to get you to join their new branch, and it is their bait for human fish. But you are not going to be caught like fish in a net unexpected, and you are not going to let Local No. 35 fool you the same as they have fooled the old branch. You know better than to be fooled that way because you know as well as the editor of this Chat knows that the president of the new branch is not one of the cleancut men who takes his profession seriously. Why, no, Dick De Costa, the strike-breaker and president of the new branch of Local No. 35, is by no means a cleancut man, and you have learned a good lot of his black career. The letter also stated about sending men on the road. Some picture operators are not acquainted with the constitution of Local No. 35, and that the branch must abide by that. For the benefit of those that don't know, I inform them that you can go on the road and work "If"? you belong to the I. A. T. S. E. for a period of two years. "If" you don't belong to the aforementioned for the period of two years, you must feel contented, and you cannot travel on the road, but you must keep on paying for two long years with the "Hopes" that when the time comes you may be lucky "If" you do get one of those jobs that you think you are entitled to. But you might and most surely you will be one of those unfortunate fellows that "If" they don't like your face just because some other main squeeze is ahead of you, wait a little longer because some other main squeeze is ahead of you, and surely you must keep on paying for a few more of those "Ifs" and then drop out because you can't get justice, and probably you stand a much better chance to get kicked out if you should put up an argument for justice, the same as the former branch.

Now we return to the first part of this Chat, and you will learn what is meant by "Ifs and Hopes." Five years ago Local No. 35 started to organize a branch, the same as they are doing at present, and the organization was known as the Auxiliary to Local No. 35 or Picture Machine Branch, of which the writer of this Chat was a member. The boys were promised many things, just as this newly organized branch is being promised. One of the promises was that just as soon as we would get strong enough, and "If" we could take care of that much to make a good showing with a large membership, the branch would get a direct charter. A year after the branch increased to two hundred, and at one of the meetings two international officers gave us a charter as an auxiliary to Local No. 35. Surely it was not an I. A. T. S. E. direct charter, or an auxiliary to the I. A. T. S. E., but an auxiliary to a local so as to cover the law of the international, which reads that an auxiliary shall not have more than fifteen members, and if more than that number, it must be chartered as a local. The president of Local No. 35 was chairman for the branch in accordance with the law, and for presiding at two meetings a month we had to pay him a salary of $2.50 a meeting for about a year and a half, and we paid the bill.

We gave presents to the chairman and the treasurer (who acted in the same capacity to Local No. 35) in the shape of a gold watch and chain, also a ring costing the auxiliary $75—and this was done to show appreciation to those officials for their would-be efforts and work they had done (nit).

We never in all the five years had heard a reading of the finances by the financial secretary, and waited year after year in "Hopes" (that's all we paid for) that the day will come when Local No. 35 will fulfil their promise and give the boys that which truly was and is theirs, and that is the direct charter for picture machines only, and when we woke up after all these years, we found out that we were dealing with the famous hocus-pocus concern of "Ifs and Hopes," who froze us out into the cold, and now they are trying the same thing over again with a new batch; but surely, I must say it is a failure, even though another fool is born every minute of the day.

Now, brother operators, the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Inc., Local No. 1, is not organizing any branches or departments with promises, they are fully organized as a union with a charter and a body of cleancut men, 600 in membership, outclassing the new branch and Local No. 35 in number, and in treasury, as well as mechanics. If you want to join a union, you must join a good one with cleancut officials, or else don't join any. This is the advice from one who knows and his word is his bond before "God" and man. To make application in Local No. 1 of the M. P. M. O. U. of Greater New York, apply at the office, 133 Third avenue, near Fourteenth street, any day in the week, from 10a.m. to 2 p.m. The entrance fee into the union is $5.00, and will remain at this figure for a short time only, then the fee will be raised to $25.00. So join now before it's too late and save time and money.

Business Representative.

WHY

BECAUSE

1. The perfection of its adjustment produces the greatest possible ease of operation—and practically noiseless.
2. All parts are made by THE MAKERS OF THE MACHINE—and bearing their name as guarantee.
3. The entire construction of the machine is supervised by the maker, MR. NICHOLAS POWER.
4. The stand is absolutely rigid, which accomplishes perfect projection.
5. The patented loop setter device resets the lower loop automatically, without stopping the machine—a distinctive feature which puts POWERS in a class by itself.
5. Our faith in it enables us to offer the strongest guarantee of any machine on the market.
7. Our intermittent movement is sixteen times stronger and is faster than that of any other machine. Star and cam movement no longer used.

These reasons show WHY POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH has had the public confidence for fifteen years, and WHY it does over 65 per cent of the entire moving picture machine business.

A letter to DEPT. D will give further details.

FEATURE FACTS

"It is good," is what we tell you regarding "The Impostor," our latest 3-reel state right feature. If you apply stronger terms of praise you will be saying what we personally think about it.

Every manufacturer in describing his product has worn his vocabulary of superlatives to a frazzle. We took all our "word enthusiasm," vitalized it into "act enthusiasm," then crammed it, every bit, into the film. Results? You bet! The shouting has been left for you exchange men and exhibitors to do. Can you shout—on a telegram or a letter head? He who shouts first for this film will be heard first. Take a deep breath—NOW!

EX-CATHEDRA

THE FOLK ORDINANCE

EXHIBITORS throughout the city who have only room for 299 seats in their theatres will, no doubt, be very pleased with the result of this measure, which was thrown out by the Board of Aldermen on Tuesday, March 18th. Frank J. Dowling, the Tammany Alderman, understood parliamentary procedure better than Alderman Folk, and by such tactics defeated the ordinance, over which troubles have been pending for the last two or three years. The action of the Aldermen is a direct turn-down of the Mayor's commission, whose recommendations were embodied in the Folk bill. It certainly exemplifies the fact that "old birds are still sometimes caught with chaff."

Alderman Dowling asked the consideration of an amendment drawn by himself, to which Alderman Folk agreed, thus being the instrument of his own downfall, for, as is well known among parliamentarians what would take place after the motion is considered, the amendment was not carried, and when it was voted on the consequence followed that, it being defeated, the Folk ordinance was necessarily and consequently thrown out.

Alderman Folk tried to get the ordinance brought up again, but lost the motion, thus entirely defeating the measure around which so much venom has been expended. Of course it is just possible, from what I understand, that the ordinance may be brought up again at the next meeting of the Board of Aldermen, but it will have to go through the ordinary procedure as a new bill, and may take another three years to do any good, so that, as I say, the small exhibitors are safe for a little while.

WHERE ARE WE DRIFTING?

CAN anyone in the industry give me an idea of the situation as it stands at present and its solution? I have advocated many times within the past few months the open market and the survival of the fittest, but in this survival of the fittest it must be only such a class of films that will do justice to the exhibitor. I have been intensely interested by the request of some prominent exhibitors for me to see the films shown in this city and make out a program therefrom. The following is the result of what I would consider an ideal program from the films that I was able to see. I may state at the commencement that I was not able to see any film of Essanay, Urban Eclipse, Majestic or Lubin, nor was I able to see the feature films put out by the Great Northern at these theatres, and after carefully considering the position for one week the following is a program that I would recommend for a week's supply, assuming an open market could be created through which they can be obtained:

Ambrosio, Biograph, Cines, Eclair, Edison, Gaumont, Gaumont Weekly, Great Northern, Pathe Weekly, Pilot, Reliance, Rex, Ryno, Selig, Thanhouser. I saw many films which I thought were not up to the standard either with photography, or plot, or staging, among which was "101" Bison, which I consider extremely poor compared to what it used to be some six months or so ago. Imp and Nestor were about second or third rate. Powers Picture Plays were poor, and so were several new makes; in fact, the new makes ought not to have been allowed to be put on the screen, not only for the poorness of their product, but the lack of technical knowledge and inexperienced workmen. The directors in some of these films are also lacking a grasp of the situations presented to them. I may have more to say on this question when I criticize the technique of some of the films I have seen; therefore I commend the getting together of the exchange men to protect themselves in the manner of purchasing only that which is suitable to themselves, and I think if a good selection is made without any bias the trade will benefit very much thereby, and the open market will be helpful to the public primarily.

I do not know if P. A. Powers is the "Man of the Hour"; whether he will have the support of the rank and and file with him in the efforts he is making, but at any rate he is to be commended for the stand he now takes for the future good of the industry. The question of the open market is very much elated by the cry of the Universal, which seems to me to be the gasping efforts of a drowning man catching at a straw, or any small hope, of retaining a stand in the industry.

It needs men of honesty, men of caliber; not selfish, money-making sycophants. I well remember the time when a crisis appeared and one of the manufacturers of films was in great jeopardy of being refused by the exchange men, and a proposition was put up to me that I delegate someone to take charge of the News while I stumped the country on behalf, ostensibly, of educational films, but incidentally of one brand which was in bad repute at the time. I have never been forgiven for refusing to act on this suggestion. If good quality of film only is purchased by the new organization, or co-operative movement among the exchange men, nothing but the best interests of all concerned will be accomplished.

Speaking about the conditions of to-day, we were informed that the whole was a move on Pat Powers' part to regain control of the shares he sold and for which he was paid $280,000, and which he offered to repurchase for double that, or $560,000 of Uncle Sam's good money. I have tried to give an unbiased opinion of both sides of the question, and now leave it for the exhibitors to decide what they will do with the quarreling factions in the industry.

SCHOOLS

DURING the past week there came into the office three people asking my approval of schools which they had already founded or were about to found. There also came to consult me several would-be operators, scenario writers and actresses who had received glowing prospectuses from the school. I wonder how many more times it will be necessary to say that the News will not publish any school advertising, however plausibly it may be worded, unless it is of the highest class, courting unstinted investigation. Such schools I have not yet found, and until I do I shall continue to refuse the advertisements and the praising of such, and if every paper would take the stand I take there would be fewer people parted from their good money.

I have had to call the attention of Uncle Sam to one or two of these fraudulent concerns, and while in this connection I want to say that my article of a short while ago on "Schools" obtained several responses—from the Literary Digest, who said they would not take any more advertising of this class, but that they had received no complaints from any of their readers. One editor threatened me with a libel action because I mentioned his paper in this connection, and asked me why I did not include the Motion Picture Story Magazine in this connection. It certainly was an oversight, but other papers or magazines can please themselves what they do; that is nothing to me. I am only trying to serve my readers by keeping them out of the mouths of sharks, and if I do lose a few dollars by such a principle I gain more in the satisfaction of knowing that I have done what little good I could for those who put their trust in me.

Alfred H. Saunders.

ROCHESTER EXHIBITORS' BALL

The first annual entertainment and ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors of Rochester will be given at the Convention Hall, Thursday evening, April 3, 1913. A number of picture players representing both the independent and licensed companies will be present, and a prominent member of each will lead the grand march.

In addition talent from local theatres will display their abilities, a number of civic and political bodies have promised to grace this occasion with their presence. Moll's Augmented Orchestra will furnish the music, and this will be one of the greatest social affairs in Rochester.

EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE

On Saturday, March 15th, W. R. Wilson, State Treasurer of Ohio, telephoned to President Neff that a bill had been introduced by John F. Kramer of Mansfield, Ohio, to close all picture shows on Sunday. This bill is known as House Bill No. 591. Mr. Neff arrived in Columbus at 10.30 Sunday morning and immediately communicated with the legislative committee. He left Columbus at 3 o'clock Monday morning, arriving in Cincinnati at 9.20 a. m., two hours late, owing to the engine of the train jumping the track just west of Springfield, Ohio. There is no chance of House Bill No. 591 passing; the wheels of justice have been placed in motion and the people will be heard from. It is just such bills as these that continually annoy the Motion Picture Exhibitors and agitate and aggravate the public.

A meeting of Cincinnati Local No. Two was held in President Neff's office in the Mercantile Library Building, Cincinnati, on March 18th. Matters of importance were discussed and business transacted. New passes have been issued to about two hundred city officials and friends of the Motion Picture Exhibitors of Cincinnati. Each pass is issued to the individual named and extends the privilege for the holder of the pass to bring one with him. The pass is good at fifty-five picture theatres in Cincinnati; those who are fortunate enough to receive one feel very much complimented, as the pass is considered of great value. In other words, a pass signed by the president and secretary of Local Number Two is accepted by every member of the League. Officers present at the meeting were President A. C. Dinglestedt, First Vice-President G. W. Hill, Second Vice-President Charles Sternberger, Secretary H. Heimerdinger; Treasurer Otto Luedeking. Fred A. Botts was also present.

NOTES

Mr. Jas. Steele, formerly manager of the old Calcium Light Exchange and recently manager of the General Film Company of Cincinnati, ever since it started, has resigned. Mr. Jas. E. Willis of Cleveland arrived in Cincinnati Monday morning and placed a new man in Mr. Steele's position.

Mr. J. M. Bradlet left Cincinnati Tuesday morning, March 18th, for New York.

J. H. Broomhall, Ohio State Secretary, visited President Neff at his office Thursday.

F. J. Rembusch, National Vice President, from Indiana, came to Cincinnati to see Mr. Neff on last Thursday, but Mr. Neff was in New York. He called at headquarters on Tuesday, March 18th, where he held a long consultation with the National President.

Timothy S. Hogan, Assistant Attorney-General, called at Mr. Neff's office during the week.

Mrs. Louisa Schmitz, who was elected a delegate to the New York convention, visited Mr. Max Stearn and his sister in Columbus last Sunday.

It is reported that the Cincinnati Poster Company has gone to New York, to sell their poster business to the General Film Company.

MISSISSIPPI EXHIBITORS TO ORGANIZE

A convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors of Mississippi will meet in Gulfport, Mississippi, on the 28th of March, 1913, at 10 o'clock a. m., in Convention Hall of Great Southern Hotel for the purpose of organizing and affiliating with the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. Mr. M. A. Neff, President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, will be there to effect the organization.

EXCHANGE COMBINE

Thirty-two film exchanges, located in the West, Middle West and South, some in Canada, have combined as the Independent Exchange Company, with P. A. Powers as general manager. This became known with the acquisition of New York offices. The concern will buy films, fixing the price on a merit basis. A statement from them says:

"The object of this new company is to antagonize no one. We wish to work with every one and have every one work with us. We do not want films of an inferior quality forced upon the exhibitor, and will buy anything on the market provided it is put up for inspection. We want productions that are meritorious and inoffensive, that will pass the most critical censorship board. We will buy from anybody, manufacturer or corporation, that will meet these requirements. In this way the exhibitor and the patron will be protected.

"With a forced programme they have been compelled to take anything that was given to them, good or bad. They were not permitted to select the good and leave the bad, thus working a hardship upon themselves and their patrons. To eliminate this evil this new company has selected P. A. Powers as general manager. Under his critical eye and that of the National Board of Censorship every production must pass before it will be sold to the exchanges. Hardships have thus been thrust upon exchange men when censorship condemned a film, as they then had no redress. Such a thing will not be possible in this new organization, as, in addition to the two mentioned critics, three or four others will work in harmony with them to get pictures that will not offend the most scrupulous.

"The headquarters will be at 133 West Forty-fourth street, New York City. The price to be charged for films will be on a merit basis. Good films will cost the exhibitor more than mediocre ones, and the programme will be clean and made up exclusively of high quality films. Any legitimate manufacturer who submits productions will have an excellent field. This is filling a long felt want.

"This new enterprise is not organized to make profits, as the expenses will be paid by the exchange men on a pro rata basis."

To meet the above conditions the Universal Film Co. will (so we are given to understand) reduce the price of their product to 5c. per foot, working for an open market, which seems inevitable during the present phase of disorganization and poor results.

MARY WILLS ALDEN

The impression one gets from a visit to Miss Alden's dressing room at the Ramo Studio is a very pleasant one indeed. There is a cosiness and a bright cheerfulness within that surely must emanate from the young woman herself, for a dressing room is just a dressing room after all, with its numerous conventional accessories and necessities.

To be sure, with eyes and cheeks and otherwise pretty lips besmirched with the paint of the stage that helps distance to lend enchantment to the view, it was difficult to form an accurate opinion of the facial charms of Miss Alden; however, judging from our front cover portrait, there is a girlish piquancy about her face that is delightfully refreshing to look upon.

And Miss Alden combines charm of person with charm of intellect. Her manner of speech is correct and winsome. About the shelves of her dressing room lie, side by side with the eyebrow pencil and the rouge pot, student books of French and German, and moreover when she talks to you you feel instinctively that she has been a student.

New Orleans is Miss Alden's home town: it was there in the quaint old French flavored city that her early days were spent. It was from there that she went out into the little big world as an actress. Some of her stage experience has been gained in the company of Ethel Barrymore: the stages of Europe, too, have added zest to her work, and European audiences have applauded the efforts of the little actress.

Several years' work in moving pictures, commenced in the studios of Pathe Freres, have added to charm of voice, pantomimic insight and efficiency, and with Miss Alden in the female lead, the Ramo Films have every opportunity to make good.

At the request of many principals and teachers in the public schools of New York, the daily matinee exhibition of the Kinemacolor pictures of "The Making of the Panama Canal" and "Actual Scenes of the Balkan War" at the Carnegie Lyceum, has been changed from 2.30 p. m., to 3.15 p. m., thus enabling teachers and pupils to attend week-day matinees. This attraction is now well into its fourth month at the Carnegie Lyceum and continues to draw in a way which promises to make the run indefinite.

AMERICAN HOLDS ANNUAL FROLIC

Players of the American Film Mfg. Company at Santa Barbara held their annual dinner and dance at the beautiful Hotel Arlington, last Saturday. About fifty attended the big dinner, and after "the eats" the players amused themselves until early morning by dancing.

MR. BERNARD M. CORBETT WITH MOTIOGRAPH COMPANY

Mr. Bernard M. Corbett, for a number of years demonstrating salesman for The Thomas A. Edison, Inc., recently has signed as a traveling demonstrating salesman for the Motiograph, which is manufactured by The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Company, of Chicago.

Mr. Corbett is going to share the Eastern territory with Mr. Fred A. Clark, who has been with the Motiograph people for the past two and one-half years, both Mr. Clark and Mr. Corbett will make their headquarters with the New York office of this well-known machine, at 30 East 23rd street.

BERNARD M. CORBETT

Mr. Corbett is a member of the I. A. T. S. E., Boston Local, and in addition is a member of the Winthrop Lodge No. 1078 of the Elks, and numbers among his friends many of the old guard in the picture business, he, himself, having been in the game for a great many years, having worked up to his present position from that of operator in the New England Theatres.

Before signing on with the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Company, Mr. Corbett had been offered a position with the American Talking Picture Machine Company of New York, but, for reasons of his own, preferred to take up the sale of the Motiograph machine in the Eastern territory.

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE FOR HAYTI

Mr. H. Arnous, of Port au Prince, Hayti, has just purchased from J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," a complete moving picture machine with full equipment of supplies. Mr. Hallberg also reports the sale of a Powers No. 6A with Hallberg A. C. Economizer to S. Manheimer, Bath Beach; also a Powers No. 6A to James Hamilton of Philadelphia.

THE IMPOSTOR

(Gaumont State Right)

The above has special merit in conception and dramatic action. The plot of the story has sufficient complication to make it interesting. The work of the child-actor in this film is most remarkable, and that such an accurate conception of the sentiment of the story and the particular role which she played is possible in a mere child is something to be commented upon.

The theme of the story, as implied in the title, deals with deception and crime. Madame Durvieux, a wealthy Parisian widow, still mourning her son who left Paris some ten years previously under a cloud, at last receives a letter from him, telling that he has refrained from writing because of his former errors, but that now he is dying, and requests that his mother provide a home for his wife and little daughter. Upon receiving a cable from her husband's mother welcoming her and her child to her home, the daughter-in-law books passage from New York to Paris. On her way across the sea she meets with two wily individuals, a man and a woman, whom she mistakes for gentle people, but who are really impostors and traffickers in human beings. They arrange to have a cable sent to the young woman, represented as coming from her mother-in-law, saying that she is unable to receive her. Overcome with sorrow at the situation, she is comforted as the strangers continue to press their attentions. Upon arriving in Paris they find her a boarding house at one of their haunts, while the woman, impersonating the young widow, and having gained possession of photographs, papers, etc., is received with open arms by Madame Durvieux, who is made to believe that the child, too, is dead. The widow in the meantime is engaged through the influence of the man to chaperon a party of young women to Buenos Ayres, but as they are about to board ship the man is arrested as a white slave dealer and the party is taken into custody. The child, meantime, has been sent to live with the scum of the earth, and is made to aid in the support of a bad man and woman by selling flowers in the street. The climax of the story comes when, during the period in which the widow is disentangling herself from the unpleasant circumstances into which she has been led, the child, having been left the address of her grandmother by her mother, sets out to seek Madame Durvieux's home. Following her arrival at her grandmother's comes the clearing up of the case, the impostor is denounced and the widow and her child come into their own.

This film is fully up to the Gaumont standard.

SCENES FROM "THE IMPOSTOR"
Gaumont Feature Release.

C. LANG COBB has just returned from an extended trip from Boston to Denver, visiting the numerous exchanges along the line and incidentally introducing Ramo Films. From now on Mr. Cobb will have charge of the sales, publicity and advertising department of the Ramo Film Company. He was the only representative of a manufacturer present at the Conference of Exchangemen in St. Louis, which terminated in the formation of the Independent Exchange Company.

FRED MACE is as busy as the proverbial "bird dog" these days. Together with his motion picture activities, Fred has taken under his wing Big Ed Kennedy, a promising candidate for heavyweight honors, and has arranged matches right along for his protege.

Kennedy has appeared in several of the current Keystone releases, making an ideal "copper," and his handling of male factors is very realistic.

M. F. BEIER, formerly with Pathe, will have charge of the New York office of the Selig Feature Film Company, at 145 West 45th street. Mr. Beier takes the place made vacant by Mr. Harry Goldberg's departure for Detroit to assume management of the office there.

GEORGE KLEIN, of the Reliance Film Company, left last week for Jacksonville, Fla. Mr. Klein is an assistant director, and will be absent about three months.

Letters are being received in large numbers at the president's office of The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, especially from Louisiana and Mississippi. The convention in New Orleans at the Grunewald Hotel on March 26th, from all indications, will be one of the biggest ever held in the South. Louisiana exhibitors are strong for organization, and great interest is being taken in the city of New Orleans, as well as all over the state of Louisiana. The same can be said of Mississippi, where a convention will be held in Gulfport on the 28th of March at the Great Southern Hotel. Fred Abbley, national vice-president, is making a strong campaign to secure a larger number of exhibitors in attendance at the Gulfport convention than the New Orleans exhibitors

President Neff will attend both of these conventions positively. Several of the Texas exhibitors are expected to attend the New Orleans convention. Florida State Branch No. 33 of The Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America met in convention at Tampa, Fla., on March 11, 1913, and perfected a permanent organization by electing the following officers: E. O. Griffith, president; J. S. Matthews, first vice-president; A. H. Labelle, secretary; F. E. Tarbell, national vice-president; R. E. Baum, chairman, board of directors.

Scott Leslie, who has been prominent in organizing the Florida Exhibitors League, has disposed of his moving picture holdings, as he has been one of the prime movers and has been active and a hard worker of the League ever since it was started.

Reliance

"A Regained Reputation" is fair, many of the situations contained therein being truly funny. In some instances a little longer exposure of conditions leading up to certain incidents might have proved beneficial to the production.

Thanhouser

"Won at the Rodeo" is most satisfactory. This film exhibits plenty of action, with natural and consistent development. There is a breeziness to the plot and detail of the story, as produced by Thanhouser, that carries the interest of the onlooker along with it. Some thrilling scenes with bucking bronchos and their riders are shown in the development of the story.

Keystone

"At Twelve O'Clock" commented on from the farce-comedy standpoint might be considered by many to possess fair merits, but to the writer it is tiresomely foolish. In fact, portions of it are too offensive to be funny.

Broncho

"The Iconoclast" in three reels is strong in plot and action. The character of the iconoclast, which is most repugnant in quality, is brought out very strongly, and it may be that a little variation in the interpretation of the role once in a while would have been effective. The part of the priest was most satisfactory. At the finale, where the iconoclast breaks the image of the Madonna, for which his daughter has posed against his wishes, and from which incident the story gets its title, it would have been better to have closed the picture with the priest kneeling before the crucifix after viewing the attack of the laborers on the brutal ranch owner, instead of continuing it through the scene of the cruel crucifixion of the iconoclast.

Excelsior

"Her Dreams of Yesterday," we are sorry to have to say, is poorly produced. The story is not specially interesting, and there is considerable crudeness displayed in its development.

Bison 101

"The Return of Thunder Cloud's Spirit," in three reels, has its good points; the ear-marks of the Bison are dominant in most part, but it does not excel by any means some of the former productions of this company.

Powers

"The Calling of Louis Mona," also played in two reels, although pleasing in some of its scenes from an artistic point of view, and most satisfactory as regards dramatic action and the general conception of the story, is weak morally. When Louis Mona, a protege of the monastery, is sent out into the world to battle with its temptations we would rather see him win than fail in each instance as represented in the picture. The slinking back to the shelter of the monastery to avoid the temptations which he was unable to resist glances off what might have been a manly keynote.

Rex

"Bobby's Baby" has the genuine human ring to it. This film, as well as being interesting to adults of all stations, would win the admiration and sympathy of the children. Bobby's manly efforts to care for his baby sister when his mother was taken away and strangers sought to separate him from the babe, have a strong human appeal that will touch every heart.

This week's program of Kinemacolor proved to be specially interesting. "The Royal Visit to Ireland," shows the King and Queen of England making a tour of Ireland.

"A Merry Monarch" is full of mirth and harmless fun. It treats of a drunken peasant whom the king, presumably of England in one of the early periods, takes to his palace and dressing in kingly costume, prevails on him to believe that he really is king. After the frolic is over he is taken back and thrown down on the road where he had been found and when he awakens he believes he has had a dream. The finale shows him sitting by the fire gazing in the rising smoke at a vision af his few hours of kingly greatness.

Other interesting Kinemacolors were "Fisherman's Daughter," "The Substitute," "The Story of the Orange," and "Tobogganing in Switzerland," all of which are very excellent releases.

Vitagraph

"A Birthday Gift" shows the child actor, Adele de Garde, to the good. It is a very simple story with the true pathos of the career of a little orphan whose father died in a prison hospital while serving a term for theft.

Essanay

"The Misjudging of Mr. Hubby" is an excellent comedy. The reason for both husband and wife employing detectives to ascertain the inside facts of what appeared to each disloyalty may have been too trivial, but the comedy is there just the same.

Kalem

"The Grim Toll of Death," in two reels, is one of the best war films that we have seen. Full of snap and interest, the action of the story does not lag a moment. The battle scenes of this film are tremendously realistic.

"Prisoners of War," the story of an aged veteran, who is unable to get his pension grant on account of a peculiar circumstance in the days of the war. The grant is made, however, through the influence of a congressman whose daughter is saved from drowning by the old man.

Gem

"Billy's Double" is not developed satisfactorily, and leaves the feeling that something has been deducted from the story which might have proved interesting.

Edison

"Jan Vedder's Daughter" is a pretty little comedy in which special care has been paid to the settings and costuming, which, coupled with efficient work on the part of the artists, leaves a good taste in the mouth.

"Mother's Lazy Boy" is very excellent. We have all seen boys just like the one in the film story—boys who were willing to be helpful to all but the home folk.

Lubin

"Dolores' Decision" is a story in which the theme is not specially original, but the effect of good production, and pretty touches of the human, make it most acceptable.

American

"Lonesome Joe," a "Flying A" drama of special appeal. There is a truly human touch to this film, and a quaint picturesqueness, which is added to by the sea scenes and the atmosphers of simplicity surrounding the old fisherman's cottage.

Gaumont

"O Koma San," a Japanese love story, has been done with such exceeding cleverness that the atmosphere of the story and the characteristics of the Japanese are most remarkably demonstrated by careful direction and talented artists. This is a hand-colored film in which the delicacy and beauty of the coloring is most delightful.

"When Hearts Are Trumps," also hand-colored, has some of the most delightful moments in its makeup. Also "River Scenes in Lower Normandy." The Gaumont hand-colored films truly prove a delicious feast for the eye.

Eclair

"A Night of Anguish," in two reels, is one of the most thrilling dramas now on the market. The work of Miss Julia Stuart in this film is most meritorious. Remarkable nerve is displayed by this clever actress in the scene where she is overtaken on the railway bridge by the train, and is obliged to hold by her hands to the ties, hanging her body over the fearful depth below in order to save herself from being run over. The entire production is worthy of the highest commendation.

Pilot

"Till Death Do Us Part," in two reels, is exceptionally fine. The story is good. The best in human appreciation and moral judgment is here exemplified. And the finesse of the dramatic action of the piece as developed and characterized by director and players is magnificent. The Pilot Film Company is to be congratulated upon the splendid artistic success of this production.

THE result of the first thirty days' test of film releases in Cleveland shows conclusively that the moral cleanliness of the daily programs is beyond criticism. Samuel Bullock, of the Lake Shore Film Company, in his official report covering the period from January 6th to February 6th, states the Cleveland censors have inspected 133 films handled by his company containing 121,000 feet of pictures. Out of the lot censors for the city rejected only 9 feet of film. The reports from the General Film Company and the Victor Film Company, of that city, show similarly. One hundred thousand feet of new films are being received at these three exchanges weekly. Exhibitors can feel pleased with these official tests, for these programmes are the same the country over. The figures disprove the assertion that state or city "censorship" is necessary. State censorship will give demoralizing results and such an office in the end will prove costly to the individual exhibitor. Personally we have been against the State censor for Ohio or any other commonwealth. In a way, it mitigates against the dignity of Cinematography, takes hard-earned money out of the exhibitors' pockets, and establishes a fat political office or offices to those "standing in" with the various state administrations. When a state censor is appointed for vaudeville theatres and other amusements then shall we favor state censorship of moving pictures. The exhibitors of Ohio are enlightened and are men and women of judgment. They need no city or state taskmasters.

One of the most valuable collections of ivory in the world has been recently destroyed by fire. Can it be that some of these sensational script writers have lost their heads?

While we read cleverly worded arguments to the effect that all the moving picture actors and actresses are to be gobbled up by the "legit," we are not informed what is the ultimate fate of the American actors and actresses whose places the picture stars are to take. Can it be that the American actor is going the way of the dodo and the carriage horse? Leaving out such places as the Winter Garden and the Hippodrome there are about thirty-four first-class theatres along Broadway. Eighteen of them are occupied by imported attractions, sixteen English, one Scotch and one Irish. In theatres occupied by "American" productions more than one-half of the plays are translations and more than one-half of the actors and actresses playing American rôles are English. We find English stage managers, English actors and English plays predominant. These figures are given out by a theatrical manager of note. The American actor seems to find steady employment and an established demand for his services only in the stock companies of smaller cities. Seemingly then, there is no cause for alarm as to a scarcity of moving picture actors. According to the above figures, the supply will greatly exceed the demand for some time to come.

"The Editor and Publisher and Journalist," Park Row, New York, is the Bible of the American newspaperman. The publication is to the craft what the London Times is to an Englishman. When Mr. W. G. Bondoir takes his pen in hand and writes a tribute to Editor Saunders, the least we can say is that we are thankful for a sincere and disinterested compliment which is the more appreciated because it can be heard over the insistent "anvil chorus" once so popular in Filmland. We take a pardonable pride in the following which every newspaperman can understand: "When I turn to William Lord Wright's page I am always interested in something I am sure to find there. He manages to work in something each week that makes a direct appeal to me. I say this to you because there are of course times when an editor thinks that what he does is not carrying. A speaker can tell the kind of an impression he is making, partly at least, by observing the faces of those before him. If they light up with intelligent appreciation, he may know he has captured them. Mr. Wright and other editors cannot see my face and the faces of the other readers as they read, and so editors as a class are handicapped. Not every reader who is pleased takes the trouble to sit down for a moment and write a letter in which he says he is pleased. I hope you will in consequence let Mr. Wright know that he has a pleased reader."

The new nickels may not be popular with the slot machine people, but the moving picture houses will be pleased to take 'em, so there's no apparent danger of the batting average of the-joy-of-living taking a slump.

President Neff, of the Ohio Exhibitors' League, while lobbying in Columbus for state censorship said there were 924 motion picture theatres in Ohio with a daily attendance of 1,600,000 persons. When the bill establishing a state censor is made a law in Ohio, the 924 motion picture theatres will have the pleasure of paying the fat salaries of the state censor and his assistants. That is one feature we do not like. Exhibitors have other uses for their money.

Promotors have entered the moving picture field, and are taking pages of advertising in the newspapers of many inland cities. Shares of stock in "three million dollar" concerns are offered, and one promoter states that he has engaged a plant and is hiring players preparatory to going to Florida and beginning the taking of pictures at once. An appeal is being made to exhibitors throughout the United States to buy stock. If the promoters of these "gigantic enterprises" will call at the News office and satisfactorily explain their propositions, perhaps we will recommend the proposals. Until we are "shown" we advise exhibitors to save their money. One promoter in his advertisement states "there is not a record of a picture manufacturing company, failing since the industry began." The road to wealth is strewn with such wrecks.

Editorials favoring grading film service according to the class of patrons are appearing frequently. The moving picture output should be such that little or no grading of service should be necessary. It is said that one neighborhood does not like Westerns, while another just dotes on the cowboy pictures. This may be true, but we are of the opinion that a happy medium could be reached by which patrons of both neighborhoods could be pleased. There is also something in a systematic education of certain classed audiences. A general elimination of the "high class criminal" hero, and the "ex-detective" scenario writer will help pave the way to conditions where film grading will become unnecessary.

The man who coined the saying, "A little learning is a dangerous thing," couched a great deal of truth into small compass. The most dangerous man in Cinematography is the fellow who knows just enough of a subject to enable him to talk glibly of it, and yet not enough to enable him to understand what he is talking about. Just a little knowledge unless one keeps adding to it day by day unfits him for any kind of employment. He has enough to make him feel above the grade of work just below him, and not enough to enable him to make a success of the grade just above him. He is a misfit all around, develops into a chronic kicker, vents his envy and spitefulness upon others seeking knowledge and advancement. He develops an exaggerated ego, and by comparing what he knows with what there is to know, even then he does not realize his littleness. Men of broad sympathies and the greatest charity for the frailties and infirmities of others are men who have labored and studied to honorably advance. Your self-centered faultfinder, your false friend, the man who seeks to damn by faint praise, or to destroy by innuendo or sarcasm, is a man with a shriveled soul and an uncultivated brain. We all live to learn and even the humblest and most obscure can teach something. Those who contribute to the joy of living, who are apostles of sunshine, who believe in living and letting live, and, above all, are broad-minded and charitable—they are the ones who will be known and revered in Filmland ten years from now.

By The Mahoney

Our contemporary of the Moving Picture World, speaking of Epes W. Sargent's comedy "Will Willie Win," says: "There's very little in this picture, taking it all in all," then apologetically:

"Perhaps Willie (Arthur Hotaling) might have made it more amusing if he had had (get that "had had"?) more life, he might have put more comedy into it." How kind of the reviewer to his confrere, Epes. My! My! My!

While operating a syphon of carbonic in a house of call, where Mahoneys most do congregate, The Mahoney caught the following between squirts:

"Hear about Klaw and Erlanger?"

"No! What?"

"They're in the game now, for keeps."

"Where 'd 'ye see that?"

"Gee! Is Zit writing 'movie' dope now?"

"Sure! Did you ever know anything with a dollar in it, that Jack Levy and Zit didn't declare themselves in on?"

Mahoney Frank Burton rolled up Broadway the other day, placidly humming to himself "Tom Bowling" and "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," while he toyed with the bankroll in his trousers pocket, the accumulation of many years' association with "Paid in Full."

Frank has played Captain Williams so continuously that he fairly exudes salinous atmosphere.

The Mahoney tacked to the windward, and was nearly swamped by imaginary wash from Frank's imaginary craft.

Frank employs his manifold talents between the Army and Navy, with the Ryno Company at City Island, where he is active before the camera, in roles requiring a compelling presence and forceful dignity.

Mahoney T. Hayes Hunter has at last come into his own. Klaw and Erlanger have secured his valuable services, through the weighty influence of Pat Casey, who, it is said, believes T. Hayes to be the foremost director of motion pictures in this country, not even excepting Ed Porter. Mahoney Hunter will occupy the desk of chief of the production department He brings with him the same spirit of skill, tact and aggressiveness he displayed when acting as the principal executive of supernumeraries at the Standard Theatre, Philadelphia, under Warren Hill.

Mahoney Sid Goldin, it is reported, has in preparation a new three reel feature which he recently submitted to Herr Lande, the Pittsburgh motion picture magnate, who financed that wonderfully constructed, virile, soul-stirring, marvelously wrought scenario, detailing the life and death of the world-famous sleuth, Petrosino.

The omniscient Sid's newest effort, we are told, is entitled "Whispering Winds," and he says confidentially, it contains ninety scenes, all meat, and tells a complete story, without captions. He is so fearful lest some one may plagiarize his story that he guides all listeners to some secluded spot, where he whispers the theme.

It is further reported that Sid and Chuck Conners are collaborating on a biblical subject of great depth, in which Chuck will be seen as Moses.

"Pat" and "Carl" are at it again. Gee! Will they ever get down to business? Is it any wonder that in a distance of twenty blocks, on a prominent and busy thoroughfare, nine out of twelve houses are showing Patents Company releases?

And observing tourists report the same conditions throughout the country.

Mahoney Edgar Lewis is one grand exemplification of "man's inhumanity to man." In all publicity given to F. E. Moore's beautiful and instructive picture, "Hiawatha," only one reviewer gave credit to Lewis as the producer.

The Mahoney sat in a picture house a few evenings since, directly behind a bevy of beautiful young ladies.

Billy Quirk's well-known presence was flashed upon the screen, when they shrieked in unison:

"Oh! My! There's Billy! There's Billy!"

Then a fluffy-haired "pullet" yelled:

"Ain't he just too sweet for language!"

When a voice from a tough young thing of male gender, seated near, broke in:

"Can that! or you'll get a reputation, kid!"

ATTRACTIVE SCENIC SUBJECT

The Great Northern Film Company is priding itself on the scenic subject which is to be released on March 22d in conjunction with "The New Film Actor." It is entitled "The Port of Copenhagen," and will prove one of the most interesting of the scenic subjects which have been presented of late by this company. Beautiful views are given of the harbor of Copenhagen and its commercial activities, and in addition the camera man was fortunate enough to "snap" the warships of four nations. England, Russia, Denmark and the United States are represented in the picture, and the ships are seen in all their glory of bunting and full dress. The firing of the salute of welcome by the Danish warships is a particularly interesting view, and the entry of the American warships into the harbor is calculated to prove an inspiring sight. But aside from the warships, the picture is replete with interest because of the fact that it shows vividly all the points of interest about the harbor of Copenhagen. One of the most thrilling incidents of the film is a storm of thunder and lightning over the harbor. The forts, the docks, the ferries, the shipbuilding plants and dry docks are passed in panoramic view before the beholder, and the harbor by moonlight is calculated to prove a revelation to lovers of motion photography.

GAUMONT SUFFRAGETTE PARADE FILM

The Gaumont Company will be responsible, probably, for retaining the present Chief of Police in office in Washington. The Chief was under investigation charged with having permitted the suffragettes, who paraded just prior to the Inauguration, to be mobbed by the thousands of people who clogged Pennsylvania avenue. When the district investigating committee undertook to sift the charges, they were taken to a nearby theatre and shown the Gaumont film depicting "The Hike to Washington." These pictures showed a congested condition of the street, but indicated that the police chief had done his full duty.

Credit to the Author

EVERY once in a while, the man who writes plays comes into his own. Usually it is the actor who wins the fame and the director the money, but the moving picture enthusiast is beginning to recognize the great part that the pictureplaywright has in the pleasure of the evening and is leaning on him more and more. It would naturally follow that the author of the pictureplay would be getting more reward and some of the others relatively less. Things are not what they seem, to quote Longfellow, but with recognition and understanding from the moving picture audiences, "the man behind" is being appreciated. The play is the "backbone" of the entire production; it is the foundation of the dwelling; without the idea the play would be a travesty. The one who, building the foundation, makes possible the complete structure should be proportionately rewarded. The architect who draws the plans for the costly building is sometimes higher paid than the practical builders.

The Biblical Picture

A well-known script writer says: "I was quite interested in your article in the Motion Picture Story Magazine regarding the filming of good literature. I have recently sold a story based on a certain Bible chapter, and have just completed a dramatization of certain of the psalms. It almost looks as if I had the field to myself. I have to go slow, however, as I have trouble in placing much of this stuff, but I thought you might be interested to know that some one was interested in getting the Good Book on the screen." Recently we refuted a statement that "good literature had been exhausted" and in an article in the Motion Picture Story Magazine suggested a few standard works that would be pleasing in motion pictures. We also suggested one reel productions from the Bible as the Book of Books contains enough material for a thousand picture plays. We are pleased to know that one pictureplaywright has tapped the Scriptures, rich in material, and are also pleased that there are directors having artistic sense enough to produce such scripts.

Pass It On

Edgar Williams, of Cincinnati, sends us an endless chain poem started by the Cincinnati Enquirer, and tacks one of his own to the end thereof. The verse is all right and here goes:

Is your script the very best?
Pass it on.
Dump it in with all the rest,
Pass it on.
About a week it will be due
To come sailing back to you—
What you think may not be true
Pass it on.

Synopsis Only

The Keystone Company editorial address is 1112 Allesandro street, Los Angeles, Cal. It was stated recently that only clear-cut comprehensive synopsis were desired.

Theory and Practice

A script writer in Dover, Me., writes that she has many good ideas and studies them out in her mind to the smallest detail, but when she tries to put her thoughts on paper, she becomes confused. This writer is lax on practice. She is not familiar with the tools of her trade. She has the idea but not the mechanical practice of writing, and doubtlessly the blank page looms most impressively to her. What she should do is to write. If her thoughts are confused write anyhow. The training will result sooner or later in logical thought, and the knack of transcribing the brain pictures into typed words. It is a noticeable fact that many veterans in the literary game have trouble in transcribing. We know a famous short-story writer, whose work is noted for its graceful diction. He told us not long since that the hardest work he had to do in the world was getting on paper the children of his brain. He writes, rewrites, revises, weighs words, sentences, and long and short paragraphs, and finally is partially satisfied. In a week or so he takes his manuscript and rewrites the introduction again not less than six times, and the "snapper" or end of the yarn about as many. Then he begins to think he has made headway.

Immediate Needs

Kinemacolor, 1600 Broadway, New York, gives special attention to comedies.

The Universal is in urgent need of crackerjack comedies written especially for Billy Quirk. The Universal also informs writers not to forget that it has eight companies on the coast in addition to those making Western and military films. Send Eastern dramas and comedics there quick.

Warren Makes a Change

Giles R. Warren, well-known author and director, who made Victor films famous, has severed connection with Victor, and will soon be affiliated with another company as director. The Victor Company scripts will now be read at the Universal Clearing House, Mecca Building. We shall advise the many friends of Mr. Warren as to his needs in the script line in the near future. Miss Van Buskirk, an editress who has made many friends among the writers, has also resigned from the Victor forces, and will probably read scripts for Mr. Warren in his new position which, by the way, will be one that will enable this versatile director to have full swing for his talent.

From the Keystone State

From Bradford, Penn., comes the following interesting communication:

> I am glad to see you attacking the schools. After I had written my first script and had sent it around a few times, I commenced to receive advertising matter from the schools in question. Something in one of their circulars convinced me that they knew I was trying to write a scenario. As I had never written to any of them, the only way they could have obtained my address was from some list furnished by some one around some studio. Whoever it was that did it, they were in a pretty poor sort of business. However, the "school" literature was too optimistic, and I did not bite. Things that can be learned with but little labor are not worth learning. Things worth learning always take hard work. Any school that will pretend to teach in a few lessons and for eight or ten dollars, anything that will bring in from twenty-five to fifty dollars a week, is a fake and a fraud. People in this world pay money only for skill and experience, and they cannot be bought or taught in a few lessons by some school. But I suppose this is an old story to you.

A well put argument against the fakir. Three months ago we were instrumental in losing a studio attachee his job for the reason that we "got the goods" on him. He was furnishing "schools" with lists of script writers. In rare instances the "stunt" may be done yet, but we are keeping right up-to-date on such little matters. Script editors thank us and writers appreciate protection.

A Deserved Tribute

A well-known novelist who has sold a half dozen good scripts the past few months writes in a letter these lines:

> I have never had the pleasure of meeting Mr. A. H. Saunders, editor of the News, but shall make a special effort sooner or later. He is one of those rare characters who believe in principle rather than policy, and his stand for conditions in the moving picture business has proven correct. The manufacturers have profited by his courage as well as the exhibitors.

A deserved tribute. Mr. Saunders would rather be right than President, and he also has that priceless possession, the courage of his convictions. He has accomplished a great deal for Cinematography and appreciation is slowly but surely coming to him. He is well equipped for the position he holds. He has international fame as an authority on the technical side of Cinematography. He is to the dark room what Edison is to other details of the business. He has forgotten more about the technical details of photography than some of the self-advertised "experts" will ever know.

Do Not Write Them

Unless you are a trained writer of long experience do not try to write plots for the Kinetophone. We are receiving many inquiries anent the character of the work, and Mr. H. G. Plimpton, manager of negative production for the Edison Company, has kindly announced the following rules that must be observed:

Each play should be figured to run six minutes, making due allowance for the time taken in movement or incidental business.

The characters should be few and the action laid in one set.

Either dramas or comedies will be considered for acceptance provided they are clean and free from offense. Great care should be exercised to avoid infringement upon any copyrighted work, either story or play.

A stamped and self-addressed envelope should accompany each plot.

The company will exercise due care in handling and returning plots, but distinctly disclaims any liability for their safe keeping or return. If sent they are entirely at the author's risk.

Prices vary in accordance to the company's estimate of the value of the plot. The author may, if he wishes, affix his own price, in which case it will be considered on that basis.

Address all plots to the Edison Studio, Bedford Park, Bronx, New York City.

American Adds to Editorial Force

Mrs. Virginia Whitmore is the latest addition to the American Film Mfg. Company's force at the Santa Barbara producing center. She will occupy an editorial chair as scenario reader. Mrs. Whitmore is a newspaper woman of considerable experience, and brings to her new duties a splendid enthusiasm that argues well for her work. By the way, we would appreciate something from the American editorial force as to their necessities and requirements in the script writing line.

Should Not Be Necessary

Not the least unfortunate incident in connection with the fire that destroyed the home of Editor C. B. Hoadley and wife at Weehawken, N. J., was the loss of Mr. Hoadley's library, data, notes, complete files of theatrical and trade papers, and almost priceless manuscripts. They cannot be replaced.

Mr. Hoadley had four scripts submitted to him for criticism which had been unopened and which were burned. He hasn't the addresses of the senders. Mr. Hoadley says he regrets that the manuscripts and probably money with them were destroyed by flames, and states that if the authors will rewrite their stories he will criticise the scripts free of charge.

KLAW & ERLANGER TO JOIN THE RANKS

"On the inside looking out" is soon to be the position of Messrs. Klaw & Erlanger in the moving picture field. An organization which has been in embryonic state for some little time, pending the serious consideration of all concerned, is now ready to burst into bud for future blossoming.

This organization is to be known as the Protective Amusement Company and will include Mr. Al Woods and others. One of the largest studios in the country will be built for the manufacture of the films, which will be leased or rented to a limited number of motion picture theatres throughout the United States and Canada.

Although contracts are being made in various cities giving certain theatres the exclusive right to these pictures, in the smaller cities the franchise will be given to but one. Two plays a week will be released, and the service will be ready by the first Monday of September next, when a reserve stock of some one hundred filmed plays will be on hand to insure a continuous service for one year with a change of bill twice a week.

T. Hayes Hunter has been secured as general stage director, and Pat Casey will be the general manager of the Company with offices at 1493 Broadway.

JEFF DOLAN is now connected with the Selig Feature Film Company, where he will be glad to welcome his old friends.

JEAN DURELL, who has been playing in stock at San Francisco, joined the "Flying A" forces at Santa Barbara, where she will do character work for the second company.

THE UNION OPERATORS' BIG BALL

Local 35 of the International Alliance Theatrical Stage Employees, which is composed of theatrical and moving picture operators of the city of New York, will gather at the Amsterdam Opera House on Sunday evening, March 23d, to hold their second annual ball. This ball will be largely attended by the numerous "stars" holding the boards in current successes; also the "stars" from the moving picture studios. Miss Mary Pickford will lead the march, which will be directed by one of the most prominent stage managers in America.

MISS M. I. MACDONALD of the Moving Picture News and Miss Emma. R. Steiner entertained a few of their friends at a St. Patrick's party on Monday evening. Among the guests were: Mr. Stephen Bush and Mr. McIlvaney of the Moving Picture World, Mr. Alfred H. Saunders and Mr. Wm. M. Petingale of the Moving Picture News, Miss Mary Pickford, Mr. Owen Moore, Miss Florence Lawrence, Mr. Harry Solter, all of moving picture fame. Among others present were Baroness de Bazus (Mrs. Frank Leslie), Mrs. Millie Thorne, prominent in the work of aiding stage children.

Dr. Dillabough and Mrs. May Nevin Dillabough, the well-known soprano; Mrs. J. B. Shale, Miss Beatrice Steckler, also a soprano singer; Signor Acetta, Italian tenor; Mr. Lovell, an Alaskan pioneer of '99. It was deeply regretted by the company that Mr. and Mrs. Beverley B. Dobbs, also of Alaska, were unable through illness to be present, and also was the absence of Miss Mary Shaw deplored, whose rehearsals for the opening of "The Seventh Chord" made it impossible for her to be present.

THEIR COMBINATION SUIT

By Virginia West

(Adapted from Nestor Release)

"WELL?" ejaculated Eddie.
"Well?" replied Lee.
"What's to be done?"
"Search me."
"Lots of good it would do."
"You've searched everything else, haven't you?"
"I'm ashamed to look a newspaper in the face."
"How far back are we with the room-rent?"
"Heavens, I don't know. I sneak in and out like a criminal so the landlady won't hear me. I've forgotten when we came into the beastly third floor rear. It's positively ridiculous that we can't get out of here."
"My stomach feels as though it's very tragic," answered Lee dejectedly. "I would give my hope of salvation for three good squares for about a month. I wouldn't know a piece of beefsteak if I met one."
Eddie groaned. "Oh, don't talk of food. How much coin have you got?"
Lee searched long and hard through all his pockets. "Two dollars and thirty-seven cents. Think what it would buy! But I don't dare spend more than a nickel at a time. What have you?"
"Forty—fifty—five—six—seven—eight. Two fifty-eight. I'm going out and buy a paper and then I'll have two fifty-seven."
"For heaven's sake, you idiot, don't waste a cent on a paper. You can find one somewhere. Say, Eddie," he called after his companion as he was closing the door, "hadn't you better leave your money here? Somebody might rob you."
"I guess you're right. It is a good deal of money to be out alone with," and he left it in Lee's safe-keeping."
While Eddie was gone Lee drew his chair up to the table and with a stump of a pencil and the margin of a newspaper, he began to figure. "Two fifty-eight and two thirty-seven—seven and eight are fifteen—three and five are eight and one is nine, two and two are four. Four dollars and ninety-five cents. Well, now, let me see. If we spend——"
Eddie opened the door. "Say, listen to this!" he gasped. "If we could only get them we might get on our feet again. But which would be which? that is the question."
"Well, for heaven's sake, tell me what it is. You talk like Alice in Wonderland," urged Lee impatiently.
"Listen to this: 'Wanted—A Private Secretary; also a gardener.' What do you think of that?"
"Very nice; but who'll be the gardener?"
"That's the question. Did you ever do any gardening?"
"I used to pull weeds for mother. Did you?"
"I used to scare the crows out of the cornfield."
"How long do you think we'd keep the job?"
Eddie did not answer. He sat deeply thinking.
"We needn't be so anxious. They probably won't have either one of us," suggested Lee.
Eddie sighed. "Well, we must try. I have a plan. It is the only one I can think of. We must buy one suit—second-hand, of course—and toss up to see who gets it. The one who gets it will apply for the position as secretary and the other as gardener. We will have to use all the money, so of course we will both own the suit. But only the secretary can wear it. Later on he can pay back the gardener."
"It's pretty risky, but I don't see any better way," agreed Lee.
One of the precious pennies was produced. "You flip," he said. "Heads you win."
Eddie flipped the penny. Heads turned up. "Say, old man, I'm sorry. You try," he said.
"No, it's all right. Only I'm afraid I won't keep the job. By the way, Eddie, who is the person we are going to work for—if he or she will let us?"
"It seems to be a she," answered Eddie, producing the paper. "A Mrs. Van Cortlandt. She lives at Fairfield. It's about twenty minutes out on the Pennsylvania, I think. We'd better get the clothes at once and go, for some other poor devils may want the jobs."
The selection of the suit was a serious and delicate task. It must look "nobby," as the dealer tried to persuade them played tennis and croquet. In fact, they became so well that many of them were, but not flashy. And then the one they finally selected was five dollars.
"Fine piece off goots, fine piece off goots," insisted the man.
"That may be," Eddie replied, "but we simply cannot pay so much. We haven't the money. What is the very best you can do?"
The man thought a moment. "Four an' a half," he said.
"All right. We'd better take it at that, Lee, or we'll miss our train. We'll have enough left to get us there, but if we don't get the job we'll never get back."
Lee nodded and the suit was theirs. "Say, you do look fine," he said an hour later when Eddie had finished dressing. "You look quite literary. You go on ahead," he continued; "it won't do for us to seem to be together."
When the two young men left the train at Fairfield station no one would have known that they had ever seen each other before. Lee allowed Eddie to go on ahead, and he sauntered along the road. Eddie had left a suit case at the station and intended to return for in case the job was his.
When Lee was almost to the entrance of Mrs. Van Cortlandt's grounds he saw Eddie returning. His heart beast faster. "Has he got it? Has he got it?" it seemed to say. Eddie did not show up and there was no look of recognition on his face, but as he passed Lee, he said in a low tone, without looking to the right or left, "I've got it. No gardener yet. Throw a big bluff."
Lee threw the bluff. All the questions the lady wanted answered in the affirmative he answered so, and all the questions she wanted answered in the negative he answered so. Had he been a gardener long? Oh, yes, he began when he was a boy. Was he familiar with all the latest methods? Indeed yes. He didn't believe in getting into a rut. Was he fond of his work? Nothing he liked better. He was aching to begin now. He didn't drink? No. He didn't gamble? No. He didn't smoke in his room? No. He didn't stay out late, did he? Oh, no.
So Mrs. Van Cortlandt was satisfied and when Eddie returned he found Lee weeding flower beds.
After Eddie had received full instruction as to his duties and had been shown his room he was told that his time was his own until the following morning. He said he would go for a stroll in the grounds.
Now was his opportunity to speak to poor Lee. He strolled leisurely around until he "happened" to stop in front of his friend.
"She's an authoress," he informed Lee in an undertone.
"Oh, golly!"
"I think she writes some poetry, too."
"Oh, gosh! I'm glad I'm the gardener."
"I've got a peach of a room, though."
"Yes, but think of the fresh air I get and my nearness to the health-giving soil."
"Say, old man, if you need me in any way you'll tell me, won't you?"
"Oh, sure. But you may need me first, who knows? I wish I knew whether this stuff is pansies or clover. You can tell me that."
"I'm afraid I haven't time to examine them now. I hear the tea bell."
Lee grinned. "I bet you'll wish you were eating in the kitchen with me when you find yourself trying not to eat the dishes."
Now Mrs. Van Cortlandt had a daughter. Her name was Louise and she was young and very fair to look upon. Between her bright eyes and trying to conceal his appetite, Eddie had a most distressing time. He indeed wished that he was in the kitchen, or anywhere else excepting where he was. Oh, to be able to eat as much as he wanted and have no one know how much it was!
When a young girl and a young man are together in a semi-country house in the spring of the year, with no other young people around with whom to associate, they are more than likely to take an interest in one another.

As Mrs. Van Cortlandt was most interested in her work and remained in her study long after her secretary had finished his duties, it was most natural that he and Louise should be thrown much together. They walked and rode and acquainted that they were coming very near to a definite understanding.

And what had Lee been doing all this time? To be sure, he had not been idle. He, too, was young and liked young company. In the kitchen also there was an attraction. The maid and the gardener likewise were interested. And in the evening, after working hours were over, there was always an opportunity for a stroll.

One evening this fair maid expressed a wish to Lee to go to the village the next evening. Quickly he said he would be most delighted to take her. No sooner had the words passed his lips than he realized his position. He had no coat that he could possibly wear to the village when in the company of a young lady. There was but one thing to be done.

When he left the maid he went to a certain spot in the garden and waited. Soon a little moving spot of light told him that Eddie was approaching.

"Say, Eddie, the time's come when I need help." he said in a whisper.

"What is it, old man? I am at your service. Do you need money?" asked Eddie anxiously.

"It's not that. I've got to have my half of the suit."

"You've what?"

"I've got to have my half of the suit. I'll take the coat. You can do without that better, anyway."

"Why, you're crazy. I can't go before these people in my shirt sleeves," insisted Eddie.

"Just wait a minute," began Lee. "I'll tell you how it will have to be done. There is no use arguing about my having it. I have to, that's all. Tomorrow as soon as tea is over you excuse yourself by saying you have a headache or some kind of an ache and go to your room. I'll go under your window and you can drop the coat down. When I'm through with it I'll whistle softly and you can let down a string for it. See? That won't be much trouble."

"But what do you want with it?" complained Eddie.

"Never mind. That is private."

Eddie saw the justice of Lee's claim and agreed to do as he suggested. Consequently, while Louise and her mother were still at the table, he excused himself and went to his room. In a few minutes the coveted coat was in Lee's hands.

As far as Eddie knew all went well. About ten o'clock a soft whistle sounded and he drew his coat up from below on the end of a string.

But alas! the next morning something was amiss. When Louise came to breakfast she did not speak with her usual bright smile, but cast at Eddie a look of the utmost scorn. The poor fellow was at a loss to know what was wrong. All day, whenever he had a moment to himself, he wandered around the grounds in the most dejected manner. Once he saw Lee, but Eddie imagined he looked uneasy and began trying to figure out some connection between the coat and Lee's uneasiness. He failed to find any.

That evening, greatly to his surprise he saw Louise coming across the yard to him with her usual smile.

"It's all right," she announced. "They told me."

"I beg your pardon," stammered Eddie. "I don't understand you."

"Why, your friend Lee has told me about himself and something about you. He told me about your combination suit. He had on the coat yesterday evening and was making love to our little maid. I thought it was you and of course I—I——" Louise stopped, confused.

"And you were jealous? Tell me you were jealous," pleaded Eddie.

"Yes, I was," laughed the girl, half embarrassed, and then found herself unable to say more if she had wished.

"I see it all plain enough now, but I'm awfully sorry about Lee falling in love with a girl so much below his own station," said Eddie, thoughtfully.

"Don't worry about that," answered Louise, reassuringly. "She is a splendid country girl who is working out in the summer in order to get an education."

"Then the only difficulty is that Lee and I are as poor as church mice."

"Time will remedy that," Louise answered, and again she was unable to speak.

WHEN LINCOLN WAS PRESIDENT

(Pilot)

The Pilot Company thinks this powerful drama, historically accurate in every particular, the best film it has yet put out.

A soldier has been arrested for sleeping at his post, is court-martialed and sentenced to die; although unknown to the authorities he has been doing double duty for three nights, taking his own watch in the early hours of the night and then filling the post of his cousin who has been taken ill. In the meantime Ben, who has been unconscious, is removed to the hospital, and does not know that Will is to be shot for doing his duty as well as his own. Will writes a letter to his Aunt telling her he has been faithful to his pledge to watch over her son, which he had voluntarily made when Ben had enlisted for the war. Mrs. Scott immediately starts for the White House to intercede with President Lincoln for her nephew's life. When she arrives she is refused admittance by the President's private secretary. Lincoln, however, hearing the commotion in the ante-room instructs the lady to be brought into his presence. Mrs. Scott tells the President of how worried and grieved she was when she found her son had enlisted for the war and of the relief she felt when Will had volunteered and insisted on joining the troops so as to watch over and protect her boy who had a very delicate constitution; how when her son was taken ill Will had done Ben's duty as well as his own for three nights, and that because he had fallen asleep at his post the third night he had been court-martialed and sentenced to be shot. After hearing her story President Lincoln said he was very sorry but he could not interfere. Mrs. Scott pleaded with and begged him to re-consider, and finally Lincoln grants a pardon to the brave soldier. He himself goes with the lady in order that there shall be no mistake and arrives at the place where the execution is to take place at the critical moment, just as the soldiers are about to fire. Lincoln steps in front of the soldiers pushing their guns upwards. With a hearty clasp of the soldier's hand, Lincoln says "The army needs men like you."

SCENE FROM "WHEN LINCOLN WAS PRESIDENT"

This picture, a "one reel feature" will be released March 27th. It is a representative Pilot production. They are to be congratulated on the selection of their subjects and the artistic manner in which they are handling the same.

EVERY musician should find it interesting and a pleasure to add to his repertoire at all times, laying aside numbers that no longer appeal to the player. This is the most pertinent reason for the indifferent playing and poorly rendered music in the picture theatre. There is an unexplainable tendency on the part of all instrumentalists, especially so among pianists, to hurry tempos, while playing numbers they are overly familiar with. This should at all times be avoided in picture playing, for it is next to impossible to give expression to your music, allowing its theme and thought value to appeal, when your endeavors are all centered on making a technique display in your playing. Save your hurried playing for chases, dramatic situations, such as agitatos, hurries, tumult, etc., for at such times it will be effective and appreciated. The picture requires musical tone and color, which must be sacrificed when you exceed the speed limit in your playing.

If you desire to have tone-color and expression show in your playing you must largely depend on your meno-mosso, accelerando and crescendo, all of which are impossible when you are playing a tempo in a metronome-meter, doubly that which it should be.

Remember that the diminuendo and rallantando are rarely used for any other reason than to bring you back to the normal tone and tempo.

The primary cause for this class of playing in the picture theatre arises from the fact that day after day you play the same numbers, until they no longer appeal to you as music should, in consequence you play them with an inspiration which makes you wish for the end. It requires an excellent musician to play a number well which does not appeal to him. This can easily be avoided by having a system in the selecting of your music. Make entire changes at least two or three times a week and avoid the numbers you know you are hurrying for a few weeks or month, when you can safely go back to them, finding the same pleasure in playing them as you would any new number. After following such a method for a short time you would not go back to the old droll of continuous repetition under any circumstances. This is not difficult, for if you can play fifty numbers you can play five hundred, for there are no less than five thousand published that are no more difficult than the fifty you play, and just as melodious and appealing.

The following incident, which occurred in a New York City picture theatre, is one of many similar, which should forcibly impress the so-called suggestive picture player and act as a mirror, wherein he can make a personal study of himself and realize to what extent such playing can benefit him, not to mention the discredit he creates for the author, actor, actress and producer of film.

At a projection of the Vitagraph Feature Release, "The Re-Incarnation of Karma," at a point in the picture where Karma, doing a series of contortions, is transformed into a snake, the pianist insisted on playing very pronouncedly "Every Little Movement Has a Meaning All Its Own." The tom-tom of the drummer alone was missing to make it a genuine "Midway" or old-time Bowery performance. Personally I choose to believe that Rosemary Thieba, who posed as "Karma," would not have consented to don the costume used or interpret the character as she did, had she a reason to believe that the subject was other than one based on a scientific thought or classic, the re-incarnation of the soul having for ages been a study among scientific and learned men. Had the word "Destiny" in some form been added to the title or made prominent the picture would have retained interest. Musically the picture was perfect and offered rare opportunities. The serious characteristic portions of the film accompanied by Buddhist music, of which there are so many good numbers, of all temperaments, published, with the opportunity at the opening of the second part for the lighter American numbers, would have made a musical contrast that would have been appreciated, giving the picture sufficient dramatic weight to overbalance that which some might consider suggestive. The contortions which the beforementioned pianist so faithfully burlesqued, were illusionary, undoubtedly directed to assist the scene transformation, which created an excellent opportunity for a dramatic mystical or heavy transformation number. This picture with proper music would not be censured, for the musical opportunities alone would give it the tone of a classic. In the above cited instance ignorance might have been bliss, yet there was no reason for the player to be a menial to it.

Among this week's thematics you will find mostly numbers of character, music some of which, while new, will continue to be good repertoire, have a lasting value in picture playing and well worth some study to play properly. None of them are difficult. I have found in my experience that many musicians as well as students are lax in their study of characteristic playing, giving it no thought whatsoever, their ear being trained only to that modern and strictly melodious style of music at present in vogue, drummed into their heads in the 5 and 10-cent store.

If one desires to advance as a picture player it is necessary that he come out of the old trend and familiarize himself with this class of music.

The numbers are no more difficult to play than the so-called rag-two steps. Numbers of character require that they be played as written, offering very little opportunity for faking as do the modern style. After working out a character number to the point where you know you are playing it properly you will find you have a beautiful number in your repertoire, one which you will never tire of.

It is the characteristic idea in the number that is sometimes difficult to master, not the notes or technique; and when once mastered you will never forget it, each succeeding number of same character becoming less difficult. I make special mention of this with a view of urging players to endeavor to give characteristic numbers the proper interpretation, thereby getting the character effect the composer originally had in mind. Not all numbers called characteristic are characteristic; many of them would be more appropriately called novelettes or intermezzos. Proper characteristic playing will give the picture player class in the near future and put the suggestive burlesque player on the shelf, so to speak.

The "Valse Lento Oriental" number is a very valuable number in picture playing, being appropriate for scenes which are not of characteristic setting. For weird plaintive effects as well as minor chant effects, it cannot be excelled. It should be remembered that in using the Oriental number the plaintive action should be of mystical character. It is seldom appropriate for death scenes, unless the picture is of Oriental setting, in which case it should be played very legato and slow, giving it a decided plaintive effect when the number is truly Oriental and written in minor key. It will effectively accompany scenes depicting lamentation, when the action clearly defines great heart anguish and agitation. The "Oriental Intermezzo" can also be effectively used to accompany scenes wherein plotting of mystical and deep character is prominently defined. The number must be truly Oriental and its minor theme must predominate.

ANSWERS TO INQUIRIES

N. S., East St. Louis, Ill. Glad to know you are interested. Certain conditions will make it possible for me to follow your suggestion in a few weeks. As more become interested we will enlarge on "Picture Music" in the News.

H. L. R. Order your music direct from the publishers. In case of error or any misunderstanding, let me know and I will do what I can to rectify it.

A. P., Columbus, Ohio. Am writing you as per your request, and feel positive that you will have no trouble in getting the results you desire if your pianist is at all interested in the work. "Picture Theatre Music" should be of as much interest to the exhibitor as the picture and its projection.

S. G. Space will not allow for the setting of musical plots. Am glad to note your inclination toward standard music, all numbers mentioned in your plot having excellent temperamental value. Give me your beneficial experiences, allowing me to pass them on to the many.

N. O., Philadelphia, Pa. The music you ask for will all appear under "Picture Thematics" in due time. It would be impossible for me to make a search for one or two certain kinds of numbers. It is often necessary to try 25 to 30 numbers so as to select 10 I would consider good for pictures. I never select numbers requiring a display of technique. Some numbers such as you ask for appear in this week's thematics.

PICTURE THEMATICS OF MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS

Leo Feist, Music Pub., 134 W. 37th St., New York City, sent an assortment of numbers for my approval, of which I have found the following specially adapted for picture playing: Sadi, by Chas. A. Prince, is a strictly Oriental 2/4 number, appropriate in all pictures with Mohammedan setting. Zallah, by Wm. Lorraine, an Egyptian intermezzo. There is no better number of this character published. Not difficult. Nooga, by Marie Doro, also a simple Oriental number of merit. The character is not so pronounced. On the Mesa Grande, by L. Maurice, a Mexican idyl, combining the Bolero and Habanera, which are strictly Spanish and Mexican motifs. My Cavalier and Senora, waltzes by Jos. Nathan. Two excellent Spanish or Mexican waltzes written in true fandango style. Spanish or Mexican numbers are very necessary for present releases. Curly, intermezzo by W. C. Powell, and Dancing Starlight, by Jack Glogan. Two intermezzos of very pleasing theme and excellent for the lighter action in all dramas. "Dancing Starlight" is well adapted for a relief number in Indian pictures. The Corn-Cracker, by F. W. Meacham. An old-fashioned schottische number, especially adapted for farm settings wherein the action is not of serious nature. Spring Dreams, by Robert A. King. One of those beautifully sweet sentimental numbers. The leading theme is arranged in excellent lullaby effect. Good for all series of scenes of sentimental or semi-pathetic nature. Present releases require many numbers of this character. Sunshine and Roses, by Walter Rolfe. A novelette in the nature of a gavotte. Very pleasing and modern. Exceptionally good as a preparatory number through scenes of quiet action leading up to dramatic situations. La Morsaria, by Theo. Morse. An antique number, the prevailing theme being in G minor. Good as a descriptive number in modern dramas when there is a suggestion of plotting. An excellent preparatory number in ancient dramas or pictures of antique setting. Love-Sparks and Love-land, waltzes by Abe Holtzmann. Echoes of Love, waltzes by Roi Ferrari. Three waltzes that will last and excellent for descriptive or introductory playing when the female character predominates. Golden Potlach, march in alla breve, by Martin Grenwald. A march with a pleasing swing. Will last. Love and Glory, march by Lee Orean Smith. A march that has an abrupt change of key which makes it especially fascinating. Genuine military style and will never get old. Orchestrations of the above numbers can be procured by special arrangement that has been made at the professional price of 25 cents each, but in every instance the Moving Picture News must be mentioned as the authority when sending money.

Pianists in picture theatres and orchestra leaders ordering of the above sets, will be recognized as professionals and will receive professional copies of their late popular song successes gratis. All of above mentioned numbers are well adapted for picture playing and make excellent and lasting repertoire.

COLLECTION OF FOREIGN NUMBERS

The following character numbers were selected by myself from the large catalogue of foreign numbers sold through Jos. W. Stern, Music Pub., 102 W. 38th St., New York City. All have an exceptional character value and are compositions of the best known foreign composers, who receive high royalties from their publishers: Marsinah, valse Oriental, by Phillipe Carton, while strictly Oriental, has a style quite its own and can truly be called new. Thais, valse lento Oriental, by Elizabeth Cromwell Knox. An Oriental valse lento well adapted for obtaining weird plaintive effects. Kwang Hsu, by Paul Lincke. A Chinese march that is true to its name. Paul Lincke being the composer is an assurance of its musical value. Is more difficult than the other numbers, but can easily be mastered by any ambitious player. Hobomoka, an Indian romance by Earnest Reeves. Entirely different from the usual Indian numbers, has a pleasing as well as mystical effect, at the same time being characteristic. Hanako, by Wilh. Aletter. A Japanese intermezzo in 4/4 moderato tempo. Excellent character number of merit. Beautiful Persia, by Paul Lincke. A Persian march that you and your audience will appreciate. On the Bosporus, by Paul Lincke. A Turkish intermezzo true to its title. Imam, by Nathaniel Mann. A Mohammedan serenade that is pleasing and melodious without sacrificing its character value. Butterflies, by Arthur Steinke. An intermezzo of gavotte character, very catchy and appropriate for frivolous action, flirtation. Is of light staccato movement, suggesting its title. The Druid's Prayer, by Gordon Davson. A valse movement with a sustained andante introduction that is different from anything you have got. Is a strictly serious number with a pathetic appeal. Goes from C major to F minor direct, which gives it beautiful color. Not at all difficult. While the numbers mentioned are valuable in picture playing, you should not be without "The Druid's Prayer." Price for piano solo of these numbers, 25 cents each at your music dealer's, or postage prepaid direct from publisher. Orchestrations 40 cents each, postage prepaid direct from publisher. The entire set of 10 numbers will be mailed you postage prepaid for piano solo by the publisher direct for $2.00, in addition to which he will add professional copies of his late song successes, such as "Some Boy," "Daddy Has a Sweetheart," "Ragtime Melodies" and others gratis. You must mention theatre you play at and the Moving Picture News to obtain professional concessions.

THE MOTIOGRAPH

The following interesting letter regarding the above excellent machine will speak for itself, it being a well-known fact that the Chicago Department of Electricity does not act except on well qualified experience in all things.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

Demonstrating the efficiency of the tuberculosis cure, found by the famous Dr. Freidmann, is the talk of the entire country. Many of the moving picture operators throughout the country are afflicted with this dreadful white plague, and are in hope that the day is near at hand when a cure for this disease will be positively discovered. The Health Department and other institutions in New York City, and in fact throughout the country, are doing their utmost for the prevention of tuberculosis. Factories, shops of all kinds, and tenements are inspected by the Board of Health as to their sanitary conditions and ventilations, but little is thought about the conditions of the workroom or booth of the moving picture operators. It can be truthfully stated that fifty to seventy-five per cent of the moving picture operators are afflicted with this disease in some form or other, be it ever so mild a form, and up to the present time nothing has been tried to prevent the plague from spreading.

There is much talk about cure, but not any talk of prevention or any trial toward prevention for the benefit of the picture operator, who, in reality, is working and confined in a living tomb every day of his life without a breath of fresh air. While there are sufficient laws governing these operating booths or living tombs as to fire prevention to see that the lives of the public are safe in picture theatres, and there are inspectors looking after the welfare of the electrical bureau, there are no laws of the Board of Health of the City of New York to protect the operator or to prevent the disease from spreading in the theatres. In the booth where the unfortunate operator must work there is no window for fresh air because the law does not allow it. This one thing that costs no money and cannot be controlled by any trust, the one best thing for prevention of disease, is denied the operator by the government in this city. God gave man his lungs and the air to breathe, and no living beings should ever have been allowed to frame laws preventing man from having fresh air. This is one of the many things that should be looked into by the Health Department. Lack of ventilation facilities is only one of many causes of the disease spreading in the operating booth. There are two small holes in the booth, one for the projection and the other a peephole, and the fetid odor as the breath of the people in the theatre rises upward to the booth enters through these small holes, and germs are carried along as well. The booth has no window, no fresh air, and the operator must breathe this foul air into his lungs along with the gas fumes of the carbon used in the lamps of the picture machine. The foul air in the theatre not only harms the operator, but spreads disease among the patrons. Let us trust that the Board of Health of New York City will be the first in this great country to set a lesson to other cities.

Mr. William McVey, a member of Local No. 35, the Spotlamp Workers' Union, asked the business representative of the Moving Picture Operators' Union of G. N. Y., Local No. 1, if it was the will of that body to have a committee sent to Local No. 35 to adjust matters and amalgamate with the new branch, as he (McVey) was informed that such was the desire of Local No. 1.

For the benefit of Local No. 35 or any of their members who may want to know about the situation, the writer informs all through this Chat, that the Moving Picture Operators' Union of G. N. Y. did not at any time, and does not at present, desire to send any committee to see Local No. 35 in regard to amalgamation with their (Local 35) branch. Local No. 1 does not officially recognize any branch and they are well satisfied; also do not want or are not looking for anything. If, however, Local No. 35 wishes to send a committee to the Picture Operators' Union Local No. 1, and if the committee will show credentials, then Local No. 1 of the picture operators will be pleased to interview them regarding amalgamation with Local No. 35 proper, but no branch. Again the writer states that Local No. 1 is well satisfied with what they have, and are better off than they ever were as an auxiliary to Local No. 35, and they know no branch.

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union Local No. 1, of G. N. Y., Inc., held the regular meeting last Monday night at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street, New York. The meeting was largely attended and business was very quickly finished, the meeting being adjourned. Two hours and twenty minutes was the entire duration.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

Referring to the Oldfield bill and the pernicious efforts to tamper with the Patent Law and practice, the Inventors' Guild of New York City says that

"Invention has contributed the greatest blessings of civilization, and for America has laid the groundwork of our wonderful industrial prosperity. The American patent law, by its liberality to inventors, has fostered the inventive faculty and made us the foremost inventive people. If we value future progress and continued prosperity, we should change our patent laws only after the most scientific and searching study, and only upon the most conclusive grounds."

To make any radical change in the present law or system would be like pulling up a healthy tree to see why it bore such an abundance of fruit.

As an unnecessary appeal to legislation the proposed Oldfield recodification of our Patent Statutes has been, and continues to be a brilliant success in worrying manufacturers and needlessly alarming business men who deal in patented articles. It is hard to tell what sinister influence is back of the bill, but it would seem to be mainly trust-corporeate in interest. Americans would be deprived of the present stimulus for invention and would find it even more difficult than heretofore to enlist financial support in new enterprises based on patent property (?) subject to confiscation by wealthy corporations and competitors. Furthermore the bill is based, as a pretext, on "evils" which do not in fact exist, or for which there is ample remedy under the present law and practice. The average politician does not know nor care about the merits of the matter and it behooves those who have influence with their representatives, and are interested in the industrial welfare of the country, to use that influence to defeat such a pernicious innovation.

Here you have the whole art of taking motion pictures in a nutshell; i. e., the small hand camera 1, Figure 1. You do not even have to turn a crank,—simply squint through the sight hole 53 in the post 54, take aim by means of the field under 55, press a button, and the Lilliputian interior department does the rest. This is a Muscovite invention by one Casimir de Proszynski, of Warsaw, Russia, and for dynamic concentration it beats a bomb.

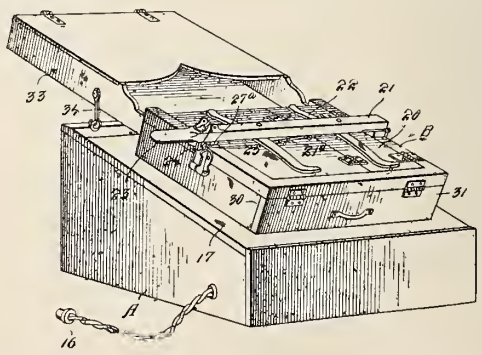
Kinematographic mechanism "of appropriate construction" indicated by lens 12 and shutter 13, and operated by a motor 23, of "appropriate type," is controlled by a gyroscope 17, which also is supposed to steady the camera in the hands of the amateur. Compressed air is stored in inter-communicating tanks 27 and passes through a reducing device 31 to the motor. The film passes from supply reel 9 to take up reel 10, being exposed en route.

Figure 2 is a vertical section and Figure 3 a horizontal section of this unique device, details of which, too numerous to mention here, are described in this Patent No. 1,052,956; but we quote that "in operation the rear end of the camera rests on the chest of the operator and the forward end is supported by the hands, as clearly indicated in Figure 1. The subject to be photographed is located by the operator through the medium of sight opening and the field finder, and with the fingers of one hand the button is manipulated to start the motor. The subject may make a wide detour, but as the camera is held by the operator, and as the latter is free to move in any direction, the position of the subject is of little consequence. If, perchance, the subject should suddenly run up or down a hill, the operator can conveniently tilt or turn the camera, to suit his convenience. In fact, because of the entire operating mechanism being portable and in such compact form, and the power means being so arranged that it can be controlled by the fingers, photographs of animated subjects can be made under the most difficult conditions, and under circumstances which heretofore have been impossible to overcome." Yea, verily!

According to an exchange, correct table manners are being taught the students of the University of Minnesota by means of moving pictures. The subjects flashed on the chapel screen include eight "perfect lady" students seated at a dining table and deporting themselves in a proper manner. The abuse of table etiquette is shown by pictures of eight other students conducting themselves in a manner indicative of ill-breeding. This, of course, is an innovation primarily for the benefit of the rising generation; but why not thus "Teach your grandmother to suck eggs"? It would be much safer and more polite than the old method.

The apparatus shown in the perspective taken from Patent No. 1,052,732 relates to the class of printing machines in which electric lights are automatically turned on by the closing of the platen and locking of the presser bar, and automatically turned off upon the release of the presser bar and opening of the platen.



A designates a box casing on top of which is set the negative holder B, provided with a surrounding frame 17. 21 is the presser bar which operates the platen 20, and carries the springs 22, which cause the platen to press the paper against the negative. On the outer end of the platen is a hinged grip section 23 that has a depending catch 24 which engages a latch 25 on one side of the negative holder. To unlock the presser bar it is only necessary to swing the grip 23 upward to release the catch from the latch. 33 is a removably held receptacle for prints. Those in search of more light on the subject had better consult the patent, as all the lights are internal and the specification long, equivocal and not easily digestible, which is not necessarily the inventor's fault, although he hails from South Bend, Indiana, and answers to the name of G. A. Ley.

Jelly vs. Dils, 27 W. Va. 557, is evidently a case of mixed pickles.

One excuse for Vaudevillian "Interimers" in Motopicto-Theatres is the time and labor involved in effecting a change of reels, unless two projecting machines are employed, used alternately. Joseph B. Pezzagila, of Rio Vista, Cal., proposes to obviate delay between reels by providing means whereby one film will automatically pick up and thread a succeeding film through the projecting apparatus. Fig. 1 illustrates the use of the invention in conjunction with any type of motion picture machine 1, having the usual light box 2, and lens and shutter mechanism 3; and Fig. 2, shows the hooked portions 22 and 23 at the front and rear ends of a film, the hooks being positioned on opposite sides of the film, and 24 representing flat base plates formed with barbs 25 and 26 by which the hooks are secured to the film; 28 being the usual sprocket perforations.

Supported in proximity to the mechanism by adjustable legs 4, is a receptacle 5 divided into compartments 6 in each of which is a shaft 7, supporting a reel 8 from which is unwound the film carrying the pictures which are to be projected successively on the screen. The reels 8 are positioned within and withdrawn from the receptacle 5, through the side thereof closed by a door 9, provided on its inner surface with flat spring fingers 10, which, when the door is closed, are adapted to press against the side of the reel. Extending through each compartment 6 and through an opening in one end of the receptacle 5, is a guide-way formed of a flanged (12) base board of width slightly greater than the film to be guided by the side flanges thereof. Cover plates 15 and 15', provided on their inner sides with longitudinally extending flexible spring fingers are held in closed position by suitable catches 15 and 15'. Projecting from the edges of the side flanges 12 and arranged oppositely from each other are arms 19, in which are journaled the ends of shafts 20 which support idler rollers which confine the films within the guide after they are once fed thereto.

The front ends of succeeding reels are so positioned within the covers 15, 15' of preceding reels that the hooks 22 on the rear ends of the latter engage with the hooks 23 on the front ends of the former, and hence one film after another is drawn successively through the apparatus 3, it being only necessary to thread the first film through said apparatus. The patent is No. 1,051,630.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

NEW YORK CITY OFFICIALS APPEAR IN BIG FEATURE FILM

Mayor Gaynor, District Attorney Whitman, Frank Moss, and Canon Chase figure in the sociologic production made by Leon J. Rubinstein, which is to appear in the feature film of the Ruby Feature Film Company of 145 West 45th street, "The Doom of the Gunmen of New York." It embraces an absorbing study of juvenile delinquency, together with a dramatic story attractive to the general public and the student of life. In it figure an array of noted people. The story proper deals with the careers of two boys, one of whom places himself under the guidance of the settlement workers, many of whom live in the crowded sections for the purpose of studying conditions; the other allows the street corner to adopt him, and although the result is startling, it is nevertheless founded on fact. The plot and action are the visualization of the actual experiences of Leon J. Rubinstein, who for years lived in New York's great Ghetto. The dramatic action deals with the activities of the gang in all of its phases. The gradual making of the gunman is emphasized, and the boy is shown to develop from a fun-loving, mischievous youngster to a criminal. A romantic thread is woven, which, however, does not occupy the center of the stage. That the broad and evil path is not a paying one, however, is forcibly brought out in connection with an interesting portion of the picture, which delineates the undeniable bond existing between the organized gang and the vicious political campaign. The politician avails himself of the services of the gang on Election Day. Like other gang outrages from time to time, this exhausts the patience of the community, with the result that the matter is brought to the attention of the district attorney. That official loses no time in rounding up the gunmen. A confession is wrung from the leader and this leads to the downfall of the politician after he has been put through a powerful third degree. It is in this situation that the wayward leading character recognizes in the district attorney his pal of school days, and there is a startling result. The man is given a chance for regeneration which he fervently grasps, so that the end of the story leaves a pleasant taste in the mouth.

"MATCHES" A REMARKABLE PRODUCTION

Under the odd title of "Matches," suggesting illumination or matrimony, the American Film Manufacturing Company has just made a splendid little love story amid some of the prettiest scenes in all California.

Jack Kerrigan, as a rare matrimonial catch, arrives at the rich widow's mansion in a snappy roadster with an English chauffeur driving. He is introduced to Jessalyn Van Trump as his logical choice, but with the perverseness that ever characterizes Cupid, promptly falls in love with Miss Oldrock, daughter of a wealthy widower who is pledged to remain single until his daughter marries. Now Miss Van Trump, as the chosen one for Jack, falls in love with her own chauffeur, a horrible situation truly, but wonderfully relieved by the discovery of Jack's English chauffeur that the family driver is the scion of English aristocracy—a condition most appealing to Louise Lester, who plays the mother of Miss Van Trump. Thus the chauffeur and Miss Van Trump are united and fail to tell mama until the happy event is consummated. Needless to add, mama is delighted to find that her chauffeur is an English nobleman. This makes it easy for Jack in his suit for Miss Oldrock. Oldrock, who has been paying hopeless attentions to the mother of Miss Van Trump, is thus rendered happy by having his daughter marry

SCENE FROM "MATCHES"

Jack, thereby absolving him from his promise not to marry until the daughter marries.

From these situations arise much good-natured fun and pleasant intrigue. The entire reel is one long series of love complications. The settings used are the pick of California's most beautiful winter homes. The garden scenes are particularly beautiful and the photography is clear throughout.

S. S. HUTCHINSON, president of the American Film Mfg. Company, left for Honolulu last week, after completing a splendid reel on the chicken industry in California. Mr. Hutchinson began the picture on a chicken ranch near San Francisco and traveled to Pasadena to get certain other scenes that will make it a remarkably strong industrial. The camera work was done by R. D. Armstrong.

A. E. MORGAN, manager of W. H Crane, was an interested visitor at the plant of the American Film Mfg. Company, at Santa Barbara, last week. Mr. Morgan is a personal friend of Jack Kerrigan, having known the family in Louisville for many years. Mrs. Morgan accompanied him. They saw the making of pictures.

JIMMY HARRISON, one of the American's juvenile leading men, who is rapidly making himself a favorite with picture fans, appeared in a recent Santa Barbara production. When shown at Milwaukee, an excited spectator rushed to the ticket window, inquired the way to the film exchange, and the result was a long lost aunt discovered the whereabouts of the valuable and beloved nephew. Jimmy having discovered some living relatives, now feels like a married man. Harrison joined the American forces about four months ago, and has quickly made good with Warren Kerrigan as an opposite.

IN THE LAND OF THE CACTUS (March 29).—Estelle Royster, a pampered and petted Eastern society belle, induces by auto suggestion the thought that she has the white plague and gradually but surely acts upon her own suggestion until we find her an invalid. Her physician, not understanding the case, orders her to the land of cactus. Her father, who worships her, takes her to the Mexican border and there they establish themselves with one Henry Arce, a very wealthy cattleman and ranch owner and, incidentally, an old friend of Royster's. Shortly after arriving Arce's two favorite foremen meet Estelle and both fall in love with her in their own way. Estella favors Bob Armabile, the American vaquerro, but is fascinated by Ramon, a white Mexican. Bob's suit is favored by Estelle's father, but with love and everything that can be had for money, Estelle continues to sink as days go by. Ramon's love gives him power to see that the girl's illness is purely mental. He decides to steal her and take her into the mountains and force her to regain her health. He does so, and after a month of roughing it among the cactus and the boulders of the big mountains on the border of Mexico, she wholly regains her strength, when Bob and Arce, the cattleman, come down upon them after days of weary searching. The girl explains. The two men stand with hands out and the girl does not know which one to take, but finally turns from the Mexican boy to the American, leaving the man who had worked the miracle alone in the mountains, she returning to her home, health and happiness.

VITAGRAPH

GETTING UP A PRACTICE (March 27).—Becoming impatient waiting for patients, young Doctor Bob Lyons is about discouraged. To add to this, his sweetheart's father, Mr. Irving, distinctly objects to Emily marrying Bob until he has a practice. Bob is in a serious quandary how to get it. Assistance comes most unexpectedly. Jack, Bill and Dick, three young college chums of Bob, stop off at Elmhurst to visit Bob, who tells them all about his troubles. Together, they hit upon a little scheme which proves the proper caper. They decide to stay over two or three days. That evening there is a lecture in the Town Hall, which Bob is to attend, and during the delivery of the discourse one of the boys is to enter the hall very excitedly and ask for Doctor Lyons to attend a patient without delay.

The next day two of the boys attend the Church Fair. They make themselves very popular, being strangers in town. They spend their money on bon bons, pink lemonade, etc. Suddenly, one of the boys is taken with cramps and falls helpless upon the floor. He knows he has been poisoned and calls for a doctor. His chum recommends that they call Dr. Lyons. Immediately he is sent for and hurriedly arrives, bustling through the crowd and going to the assistance of the suffering young man. These two incidents prove valuable advertising for the Doctor, and everybody in town is talking about Dr. Lyons and his wonderful skill. He is besieged with patients, and has to work night and day. He now makes bold to write Emily's father. Mr. Irving calls to see the Doctor. He is astonished to see his rooms crowded with ailing humanity, from far and near. He is convinced that Bob is a success, and withdraws his objections to him as a son-in-law. The next day Bob's chums leave town with a hearty farewell from Bob, Emily and her father.

HER GALLANT KNIGHTS (March 23).—When the farmer's daughter returned to her home in a little Western village, the young men who had ignored her when she was a child became her abject slave. She was pretty, but dowdy, when she went away, but four years in an Eastern college, together with plenty of money supplied by her father, worked wonders.

At first the girl was pleased by the interest she aroused, but after a while it palled on her because no matter the hour of the day she was almost certain to have callers. Each one boasted of his own good qualities, and decried those of his rivals, until the girl became thoroughly sick of all of them.

Affairs reached a crisis as the time approached for the annual orange picking tournament, which was a great event in that section. Each of the girl's suitors expected to win honors there, and lost no opportunity of telling her so. This induced her to promise them that the one who most distinguished himself at the affair would receive a prize from her own dainty hands. The young men were privately convinced that she took this course to select the man she could wed, and the contest immediately took on a more serious aspect.

As it happened, all of her suitors distinguished themselves, some in one test, others in another. That evening they flocked about her and earnestly demanded the special prize. Smilingly she told them that "you have done equally well, so I will reward you all." Whereupon she distributed envelopes and they found that the contents were invitations to the wedding of a girl and an Eastern aristocrat, whom none of them had ever heard of.

"The gallant knights" never jousted again in honor of their fair lady. Neither did they attend her wedding, and they were glad when she and her husband departed for the East, presumably to live happy forever afterward.

CYMBELINE (Part I) (March 28).—Cymbeline was King of Britain at the time of the Roman Empire. His only heir was his daughter, Imogen, whom he deeply loved. Imogen had two elder brothers, but they had been stolen before her birth, and it was believed they were dead. As it turned out later, Belarius, a nobleman who had been banished by Cymbeline, had revenged himself by spiriting the children away, and he brought them up as woodsmen and in ignorance of their noble birth.

Imogen had a stepmother, a haughty, cruel woman, who was deeply jealous of the girl. The queen had a son by a former marriage, and she planned to insure her own supremacy by wedding the son to Imogen. The king approved of the match, but the princess declined the alliance, being secretly in love with a young nobleman named Leonatus. The persecutions of her stepmother continued and finally the girl, yielding to her suitor's pleas, consented to secretly marry him. The queen learned what had happened, informed the king, and Leonatus was bainshed, taking up his residence in Rome. There he mourned his lost love and, on one occasion when other gallants were boasting of their ladies fair, he impulsively declared that none could compare with his princess. Iachimo, a foolish nobleman, took exceptions to his remarks, wagered that he would win the favor of Imogen, and in token of his success, return with a jeweled bracelet, the gift of Leonatus to her. On his part Leonatus pledged himself, if he lost, to hand over to Iachimo the ring Imogen had given him when he was sent into exile.

Iachimo went to Cymbeline's court and was welcomed by Imogen when he told her he was her husband's friend. When he made love to her, however, his advances were spurned with indignation, and the crafty Roman saw that his wager was lost. He then resorted to treachery, entering Imogen's room at night, hiding in a trunk until she was asleep, and then stealthily removing the treasured bracelet from her arm. With this lying proof of Imogen's dishonor, Iachimo returned to Rome and forced Leonatus to confess that Iachimo had won the wager. Half beside himself with rage and grief, Leonatus planned the death of his gentle bride. Through his faithful servitor, Pisano, he sent Imogen a loving letter asking her to meet him at a lonely spot outside of Cymbeline's domain, explaining that it meant death to him if he entered the territory of Britain. There was another note, however, addressed to Pisano, in which Leanatus commanded his follower to slay Imogen when she had been lured out of Britain. Imogen received the note with rapture and, after consulting with Pisano, disguised herself as a page and trustingly accompanied Pisano to the place selected by her revengeful husband as her grave.

PART II.—Leonatus was banished from the court of Britain because he secretly married Imogen, the daughter of King Cymbeline. A crafty Roman nobleman, named Iachimo, convinced Leonatus that his wife was untrue to him, so he planned her death. Dressed as a page she went to a lonely spot outside Britain expecting to meet her husband as he had promised in a letter. She found, however, that she had been enticed there to meet death, but her husband's servitor experienced remorse and at the last moment declined to stain his hands with innocent blood. Imogen, grief-stricken, refused to return to her father's court, and wandered out into the world. The servant sent word to Leonatus in Rome that Imogen was dead, and Leonatus, who now regretted his hasty and cruel action, bitterly reproached himself.

In her wanderings through the forest Imogen came upon the cavern home of three woodsmen, an old man and two young men. They did not suspect that the graceful page was a girl in disguise, and became devoted friends. The young men were the sons of King Cymbeline, who had been stolen from the palace when children and brought up as woodsmen without any knowledge of their royal birth. At the court they had long been mourned as dead.

About this time the army of Rome invaded Britain and the forces of King Cymbeline were rallied to oppose them. Among those who cheerfully offered themselves were the woodsmen and the two youths who unwittingly were battling for their father. In the fight which ensued these young men, aided by a supposed peasant, turned the tide of battle and brought victory to the forces of King Cymbeline. When the enemy had been captured the heroes were brought before Cymbeline and warmly commended. As the peasant stepped forward Cymbeline recognized in him Leonatus, who, having heard of the proposed invasion, had fled from Rome to offer his services to his country.

A greater surprise was in store, however, when the woodsmen stepped forward. The eldest of the three told Cymbeline that he was Belarius, who had been banished years before and had plotted revenge; then, pointing to his youthful companions, he said to the King, "Sire, I stole your sons as babies—I give them back to you." The king greeted them affectionately, and pardoned Belarius.

Among the Roman prisoners was Iachimo, wounded and dying. The approach of death caused him to confess that he had cruelly maligned Imogen, and he explained to Leonatus how he secured Imogen's bracelet, not as a lover but as a thief. Leonatus, racked with remorse, was about to slay himself when from the group of prisoners nearby a young page bounded, seized the weapon and hurled it from him. He gazed at the page and recognized his beloved wife. She had been captured by the Romans prior to the battle and forced to act as the general's servitor.

Humbly Leonatus begged his wife's forgiveness. Graciously she granted it and the sorrows of the past were forgotten in the happiness of the present and the bright hopes of the future.

PATHE

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 12 (March 17).

THE VENGEANCE OF THE KABYLE (March 18).—Messaoud, an Arabian landowner, meeting Aicha, the beautiful daughter of a neighbor, takes advantage of the law allowing him more than one wife, and marries her. The new bride forces Flouka, Messaoud's first wife, to become her servant. Flouka rebels and is being roughly treated by Messaoud when an American, passing by, interferes. He takes Flouka with him as his housekeeper. Some time later Messaoud calls upon the American and assures him that he bears him no ill will. While the men are drinking together Messaoud poisons the American's drink. But he has been observed by Flouka and, seeing an opportunity to be revenged upon Massaoud and at the same time save her defender's life, she reverses the position of the drinks, making Massaoud the victim of his own treachery.

THE ESCAPE (March 19).—Two convicts, Joe Norton and Charles Wendell, make their escape from prison and in their flight take different roads. Norton is wounded and nearly famished when he arrives at the farm of William English. He is nursed back to health and given work on the farm. English's daughter, Dorothy, is engaged to marry one of her father's employees when she meets Wendell, now a prosperous business man. Wendell dazzles the girl with promises of great wealth and position until she consents to elope with him. Norton recognizes Wendell, learns the situation, and, as they are about to elope, sends the girl back to her lover and, at the point of his gun, sets Wendell adrift out of the neighborhood.

DEEDEE'S BLIND MASTER (March 20). Deedee, a very intelligent fox terrier, is "general manager" of Blind Bill's newsstand. While groping his way about the street one day Bill is struck by a motor car. Although not seriously injured, Bill is taken to a hospital. The owner of the motor car, to make amends for the injury, gives the hospital surgeons instructions to do everything they can to restore Bill's sight. A renowned surgeon is placed in charge of the case and performs a delicate operation. The operation is a success. Bill is the happiest man in the world, but Deedee does not share his happiness. The faithful dog finds that his services are no longer necessary and disappears. Bill's long search for Deedee is rewarded by finding him attending the wants of a cripple—an unfortunate really in need of his services.

RASTUS LOSES HIS ELEPHANT (March 21).—Rastus, a circus attendant, with an elephant on his hands, stops with the elephant in the street to greet his friend Mirandy. Taking advantage of his keeper's momentary laxity, Jumbo starts out for himself. A vegetable cart is first to claim his attention, and when he has finished with it he is in high glee. The police interfere with him and he resents their interference, chasing the brave officials out of headquarters and through some of the funniest situations imaginable.

On the same reel:

THE DEATH HEAD MOTH.—A study of the largest species of the butterfly family, remarkable for the skeleton head marked on its back.

WHEN THEY WERE KIDS (March 22).—An old and long-married couple look back upon the romantic days of their youth. Closing their eyes and allowing memory full sway they find themselves in a colonial setting, principals in a delightful love story in which a ragged little chap by his courtesy wins the heart of a wealthy little lady and thus gets an opportunity to make his way in the world. The story ended, they open their eyes, smile upon each other, and prove that "they lived happily ever after" by a fond embrace.

THE GEYSERS OF NEW ZEALAND.—Remarkable photographs of New Zealand geysers in full action are contained in this subject, including the famous geysers of Wakerewa in South Island and Papakura in North Island. The New Zealand geysers rival the famous Hot-water Springs of Yellowstone Park, and nothing more spectacular could be imagined than these pillars of boiling foam ever rising and falling, and then bursting forth afresh, their pure white foam sharply outlined against the background of deep blue sky. It is said that a burn inflicted by the burning water will never heal. A party of tourists were recently standing by an inactive geyser which, bursting suddenly into activity, caused the instantaneous death of the entire party.

Synopsis.

1. Government Springs at Rotoroa. These are natural hot-water springs which have been enclosed and are reserved for the use of Europeans. The baths are situated in the midst of beautiful gardens, many excellent views of which are included in this section.
2. Inferno Pool. This is a pool of water considerably above boiling point. It is seething and tossing, the steam rising up in clouds.
3. An Active Geyser rising 90 feet high. The period of action does not extend beyond two minutes in this case. Round the base of the geyser is a silica formation produced by the chemical action of the water.
4. A Geyser Pool inactive, a natural cauldron of boiling water.
5. The Papakura Geyser is always active and makes a very beautiful picture, the pillar of white foam outlined against the blue sky.

PRESIDENT WILSON REVIEWING THE TROOPS.—By special permission of the War Department, which desires to preserve this record among the military archives of the Government, the Kinemacolor Company of America was granted the exclusive privilege of photographing President Wilson reviewing the troops at the Inauguration Parade as it passed through the Court of Honor in front of the White House at Washington, on March 4.

At the opening the President and party are seen taking their places in the Presidential box. Then comes the celebrated "Black Horse Troop" of the Culver Military Academy—an escort of honor to Vice-President Marshall. This is a very striking picture—the handsome black horses and every detail of their equipment and the uniforms of their riders being shown in colors so real that they seem to be actually passing in review.

The West Point Cadets—the pets of every Inaugural, march past with their marvelous precision, and every shade of their gray and black uniforms, with white crossbelts and feather pompons, is shown by Kinemacolor. The U. S. Marine Band, with red-lined capes thrown back and brass instruments glistening in the sun; the Annapolis Midshipmen, in marching regalia, and the U. S. Regulars—horse, foot and artillery, are depicted in correct colors in every detail of accoutrement.

This feature makes the Kinemacolor film of military and historic value, as well as being almost as real as a visit to the Inaugural to the average spectators—very few of whom are permitted to view the parade as it passes through the Court of Honor.

THE RENEGADE'S HEART (March 31).—George Fifield, a renegade, came close to the home of Violet Blake, the posse hard after him. Violet had seen the $5000 reward sign, but, despite that, gave the renegade his chance and secreted him in her room. When he left the renegade unwrapped a kerchief from about his neck giving it to her with the remark that if she ever needed him to hang the kerchief from the old tree.

The time came when Violet's father, deeply in debt, came home drunk one night and confessed to the embezzlement of $5000. Then Violet thought of the handkerchief, hung it upon the tree, and the renegade gave himself up cheerfully.

THE MUTE WITNESS (April 5).—Jim Regan, photographer, was sent by his paper to make snapshots of wild game. He found old Barlow, a trapper, possessed of two pretty daughters and promptly fell in love with Mabel, who responded. Carrie, the other daughter, loved Ralph Conway, a mountain scamp.

One day Jim, in the woods with Barlow, set his camera so that he might get a snapshot of a bear, attaching the camera by mechanical means to the bear trap so that when it should operate the camera would get the picture.

That afternoon Ralph Conway induced Carrie to elope with him, Barlow having refused permission for the marriage. In anger Conway sought the old man out, found him leaning over the bear trap and felled him with a blow. In an instant his own foot was caught and he went spinning into the air. Old Barlow, hours afterwards, staggered through the woods toward home. Meanwhile, curious about his camera, Regan went to the trap, found Conway, released him and took his camera back. In the quickly-made dark room Regan found a negative of Conway in the act of striking old Barlow. He rushed out, caught Carrie just as she was about to leave for the rendezvous and grappled with Conway. Just then old Barlow staggered in. No explanations were needed. Barlow simply took up his gun and pointed and Conway, with a laugh, turned his evil face towards the mountains.

BURSTUP HOMES MURDER CASE (March 26).—Mrs. Reggie Jellybone has her husband completely under her control. She places a reflector on her sewing table in such a position that every movement and expression and manifest desire of her husband become known to her. She is, therefore, able to anticipate his movements and interfere with his plans. He seldom gets a chance to go to the club on the pretence of sitting up with a sick member.

One night, the boys at the club need a fifth hand very badly, and, when they call on Jellybone, Mrs. Jellybone answers the 'phone, but they are not daunted. Mr. Resourceful is sent to get Jellybone in spite of his wife. A scheme is concocted and Jellybone goes to the club, leaving a dummy on his side of the bed.

When Mrs. Jellybone comes up to the room to retire she finds bloodstains on the bedclothes and grows excited. She shakes the dummy and the head is severed from the body and rolls under the bed. She excitedly concludes that her husband had been murdered, and immediately she calls for Burstup Homes, the renowned private detective. Burstup Homes arrives puffed up with importance, makes a very ceremonious investigation and deduces that the man is really dead. Furthermore, he deduces that a man wearing a ten size shoe is the criminal. In the examination Burstup Homes forgets the essentials and takes up his time with details. He follows the bloodstain clue and footprint clue. The visible stains on the improvised bedsheet ladder which Jellybone used as a means to effect his escape, also attracts the detective's attention and gives him strong evidence of an entrance and an exit from the house through the window. In fact, there are clues galore and Burstup Homes feverishly goes to work. Everyone he meets is a suspect. Deacon Stronghead, whom he meets on the way from the knife-grinder's, where he had a knife sharpened for his wife, offers the strongest causes for suspicion, because he carries a concealed weapon, and the story is more complicated when Mrs. Jellybone plays a trick on her husband. Off she goes to the club—and here comes the big surprise—she does not pounce upon her husband, as one would expect, but is so delighted that he is alive that she embraces him most rapturously. Jellybone begins to think that his wife will soon be stricken with an attack from overindulgence and suffer untold agony. The farce ends up in the police station, where Burstup Homes' failure is provocative of much laughter, but he is not dismayed at all and retorts that the police are all jealous of him.

THE CLIMAX (March 28).—George Preston, a playwright, unable to write the proper climaxes to his plays, has them continually returned, and when he and his wife, Amy, receive an invitation from Bob to the opera, is unable to pay for the gown ordered by his wife. Bob, secretly loving Amy, and seeing her predicament, pays for the clothes. She, after some reluctance, accepts, and gives him her I. O. U. Preston, however, in spite of his wife's denial, guesses the truth about the matter, denounces his wife, and forbids her to go to the opera. Bob, however, persuades her to show her independence, and she, purely out of defiance, accompanies him. He, however, under pretense that he has forgotten the tickets, lures her to his rooms, and there makes love to her. Shocked and indignant, she spurns him, but he points to her clothes. She, horrified, plucks the hat off her head, and, tearing it to shreds, flings the remnants in his face.

Preston, learning where Amy has gone, hurries thither and bursts in the door just in time to save his wife from Bob's forced attentions. Amy, humble and contrite, begs forgiveness, and Preston, after a bitter struggle, takes her in his arms and leads her home. There the thought occurs to him that he has found a proper climax for his play. He writes what has happened, and, to his delight, the manager accepts the play and pays at once in advance. Bob, hoping yet to embarrass Amy and win her, presents his I. O. U. To his amazement, Preston immediately pays him and sends him unheroically about his business, while the couple embrace at the happy termination of a near tragedy.

SPIRITS OF YOUTH (March 29).—The impecunious Jenkins is speculating as to how he can liquidate the most pressing of his debts, when a telegram arrives announcing the serious illness of his uncle, from whom he has large expectations, and stating that the uncle wishes to see him before he dies. With all speed Jenkins hastens to his uncle's bedside, and there learns that the doctors entertain no hope of recovery. As a last resort Maggie, the old housekeeper, determines to try a wonderful tonic which she has heard of, and despite the resistance of Jenkins and the doctors, she succeeds in having her own way. The tonic works like an electric shock, and soon the uncle becomes so vigorous that he begins to dance about the room like mad. The effect of the medicine is so remarkable that Jenkins decides to join his uncle in a scheme for enlivening their fellow-creatures, and the two promoters are soon hailed with enthusiasm by all those who have benefited from its use.

This last adventure proves his undoing, however, for unfortunately he loses his balance and falls, impaling himself upon the churchyard railing. BREAD ON THE WATERS (March 25).—John Wilson, in a New England small-sized city, lived and carried on a manufacturing business. His family consisted of his beloved wife, Mary, his daughter, and a rather dissipated son, Jack. Things seemed to be growing worse with the boy, so, after due consideration, Wilson decided if his dissipation continued he would send him away to try and make a man of himself. It did continue and the night finally arrived when he was going to order him away. Mother and daughter had been told, but their pleadings were useless. Jack came home under the influence of liquor and the father, unable to stand it longer, ordered him to leave and remain away until he amounted to something.

As Jack started to go the mother's love for the weak one quickly showed itself in the way only a mother can appeal. She begs him to do better, to redeem himself, not by word, but by slipping an envelope into his hands on which were written words to that effect. Jack mistakes it for a check and gladly takes it. The next day we see him about to go away. He remembers the envelope his mother gave him and, opening it, he finds the mother's appeal just as a "down and outer" appears and begs for something. The thought strikes Jack as a good joke to give him the slip of paper, and, after doing so, he boards the outgoing train for new fields.

The "down and outer" reads the paper, and it seems to give him a new lease on life. He obtains a position in Wilson's manufacturing plant, is well received and is greatly favored by Mary.

One night while calling on her he tells of his past and shows the slip of paper that helped him to do better things. She recognizes the writing as her mother's, questions him, and by degrees it dawns on the two that Jack must be found. Varick, the once "down

THE UNPROFITABLE BOARDER (March 26).—Jones, an unscrupulous young man of good appearance, does not believe in paying his bills and is constantly being dunned by his landlady for being in arrears for a considerable amount. His claim of having a rich uncle who will pay his debts is finally disbelieved and he finds himself dispossessed. His attempts to get his baggage out of the house are laughable to everyone but himself, and the stern landlady who thwarts him at every turn.

He now finds himself out in the cold world without baggage, but not for long, for he buys another suit case for sixty-nine cents, and with it sallies forth to the outskirts of the town where he finds a rural house with a shingle bearing the welcome words "Boarders Wanted." Here the unsophisticated landlady believes the tale of his rich uncle. Taking advantage of these plain country folk he makes desperate love to Sally, the daughter. She, thinking him to be a rich city chap, jilts Cy Perkins, a country bumpkin, with whom Jones has some ludicrous clashes. Aside from this Jones feels secure as far as three meals a day and his lodgings are concerned until his former landlady, who happens to be a sister to his present landlady, pays her sister a visit. Then his whole scheme is laid bare and cowardly Cy Perkins, whom he has intimidated up to this time, becomes a lion and throws Jones bodily out of the house. The scuffle continues outside and develops into a surprising and ridiculously funny climax which can hardly be described, but is sure to provoke shouts of laughter.

CLASSMATES (March 31).—Andrew Wilson and Robert Beeton are classmates at West Point. While on sentry duty one night Robert finds his chum endeavoring to sneak in after hours, and, although he hates to report him, duty forces it, with the result that Andrew is discharged from the service. Notwithstanding this disgrace, he enlists as a private soldier in a regiment commanded by Colonel Schaeffer.

On graduation, Robert Beeton is appointed lieutenant in Col. Schaeffer's regiment and promptly falls in love with the Colonel's pretty daughter. The girl, however, falls in love with Andrew, meeting him clandestinely. Robert, going on his rounds as officer of the day, finds him off post, and, investigating, discovers the young folk together. This time his report is embittered by jealousy. Andrew is remanded to the guard house. One day the Colonel's daughter is going out for a ride; she loses control of her horse. While working as a prisoner, Andrew sees the runaway and, suddenly jumping on Robert's horse, which is being held by an orderly, gives chase and saves the young lady's life. Stern discipline again sends him to the guard house. The Colonel finding out the state of things, decides to release him if he will buy himself out of the company. Andrew does so, forgives his former chum, and gaily drives of with her on an automobile honeymoon.

GAUMONT

THE QUALITY OF KINDNESS (April 1).—A thrifty lad is Tiny Tim. He saves his pennies. This habit of saving he did not inherit from his parents, who are "pressed" for money by creditors who threaten to dispossess them and seize the furniture if bills are not paid.

Tim's father sees a ray of hope in a letter from a brother in America whom he has not seen for ten years. The brother invites himself to dinner. They picture the brother as one who is horribly rich, and who, every time he sneezes, rains four-dollar bills. In order to favorably impress by a lavish entertaining, Tiny Tim's mother pawns her back hair and her husband his gold tooth.

Uncle Richard arrives. His clothes look as if they had hung around uncle for many years and that they wouldn't hang together much longer. His beard is in drastic need of a lawn mower and his eyes are long and curly. "Sweet potatoes!" ejaculates Tim's father. I thought you were a trillionaire!"

"No, I am not. I am broke—absolutely. Walked all the way from New York. Skated across the ocean."

Tim's father regretted that he didn't have a little strychnine to flavor the soup. His wife was in tears because she had used all the arsenic wafers for her complexion.

Although Tim's father was meditating upon the sweet solitude of a debtor's prison, yet, he couldn't help admiring the stalactite effect of the noodles which drooped in graceful ringlets from Uncle Richard's mustache.

Unable to stand it longer, Tim's father and mother get up from the table and ask to be excused on the grounds that they have to go to a funeral, that if they don't hurry they will miss the first act.

Uncle Richard in his open-work clothes and Tiny Tim are left together. There is nothing "stuck-uppish" about Tim. An uncle is an uncle to him whether school keeps or not. Not having a dog, he thought that an uncle would make a perfectly good substitute. Accordingly, he sits on both of uncle's laps, kisses uncle upon the right eyebrow and tells him that uncles are his favorite pastime. Tiny Tim is a kind-hearted youngster and his left bosom heaved with sympathy for his poor uncle who didn't have enough money to buy a shroud. "I will give you my money, uncle, and a cigar, too," offers Tim. Accordingly, he fetches his little bank and empties its contents into uncle's hands. He goes to father's humidor, where father keeps his best cigars (hid when visitors come), and gives uncle a handful, although it hurts his conscience to encourage an old man to smoke. Uncle then says farewell.

Later, the sheriff's men in all their muscular glory, enter to seize the furniture to satisfy the creditors' bills. Tiny Tim's mother and daddy are gnashing their teeth and would have pulled their hair if they had not been afraid of mussing it. "I guess this means living in a flat so small that they will have to paint the furniture on the walls," said Tim, Sr. "I can picture myself now in a room so confined that I have to go outside to change my mind."

One of the sheriff's men find Tiny Tim's money-box. There are a few coins in it and he starts to shake it open. Inside is a check and a letter. It reads: "My Dear Tiny Tim: If your parents are selfish, you, anyway, have a heart of gold. I am rich, and that is why I give you a check for $25,000. Uncle Richard, The Tobacco King."

Whereupon Tiny Tim's father and mother congratulate themselves on their foresight in having a son who has a rich uncle. The creditors are paid. All three go out to see where they can get the longest trolley ride for five cents. In the excess of their extravagance they buy a bag of peanuts, one of which peanuts they give to a poor man. Whereupon it is proved that it pays to have a rich uncle and that people in glass houses should never take a bath.

THE UNION ETERNAL (State Right Feature).—Mera Darvel is singing in the apartment of her invalid mother, whose illness has forced Mera to abandon the stage as her profession.

In the same house is staying James Lathrop, a naval lieutenant, who is a devotee of music. Through the windows he hears the singing. He is charmed. Inspired, he composes a melody which he sends to Mera. Mera sings this love song, and so delightfully that the interest of Lathrop blossoms into a stronger feeling. He writes to her, saying that her tender voice, ringing divinely in the solitude of his heart, makes him feel that he is beginning to live. They meet. The wooing goes on. But in the midst of their happiness he is ordered to report for duty at once.

After a three years' cruise Lathrop returns on leave of absence. The humble singer is now a great opera singer. He engages a box at the opera house where she is to sing the title role in "Carmen." He writes to her, reminding her of their former acquaintance, and asks that should she still care to know him that she wear the flowers he is sending her. She is pleased to hear from him, and replies that she will be glad to have him call upon her, and that she will sing to him his song.

Lathrop goes to the opera. The singer wears the flowers. It is a signal of happiness. The wooing is renewed.

Admiral Lathrop hears of his love for the opera singer. The admiral had high ambitions for his son and considered it a mesalliance to have his son wed a stage woman. The admiral hurries to Paris and commands the lieutenant to stop "this foolishness." The lieutenant demands the right to be happy. He declares Mera to be worthy of bearing the Lathrop name, and begs that his father sanction the match.

The father, alarmed, decides that the best thing to do is get him away from the singer. He arranges that the lieutenant be at once recalled to his duties and sent away on a long cruise. In the meantime Lieutenant Lathrop and Mera have married clandestinely. They are spending their honeymoon at Biarritz, when he receives the order commanding him to report at once for duty. His love is stronger than love for service. He swears that he will abandon his career. He writes his resignation. Mera will not hear of it. She persuades him to respond to the call, although to her it means sadness.

Mera, for consolation, plunges herself into her art. Onward and upward she climbs and greater grows her fame.

Gounod's "Sappho" is the event of the operatic season. Mera sings the title role. It brings to her another triumph. As she goes to her dressing-room she is deluged with flowers. At this moment there comes from her husband a telegram, wishing her happiness on the night of her success. As she is reading this and longing that she might feel his dear arms around her and the warmth of his dear lips, she hears on the street newsboys calling the tidings of a marine disaster. Intuition tells her that it might be her beloved who has died. Quickly she sends for a paper. Glaring headlines, whose black type leaps at her, tell of the sinking of the government submarine boat, commanded by Lieutenant Lathrop.

Defeated is the joy of the artist in the anguish of the wife. Mocking were the flowers of triumph, deathly the sweetness of their perfume. Through her sorrow-stricken mind there surges thoughts of the past, and, like the Sappho of old, she flees. Into the dimness of the night she wanders, harp in her hand, and unconsciously holding the trophy blooms. She wanders on and on until she comes to the waters which kiss the cold rocks in sinister way. But welcome seem the waves, since they now enfold him who had been torn from her that parental pride might be gratified. He, her loved one, who now lay stark on the ocean sands, while the denizens of the deep brushed the face she so adored. Higher and higher rises the tide as she sits on the clammy stones and raises her beautiful voice in song of sorrow.

"Nought can ease my aching heart,
Save forgetting grief in death's long sleep,
Receive me then, thou bitter sea,
To rest forever in the grim waters deep."

Up and up creeps the sullen flood until its chill had frozen in her blood the life desire. Still rings her voice over the watery wastes to her and springs back from the rocks in dissonance dolorosa. And, while all Paris spoke of the golden voice that had brought rapture to their souls, the waters at the seaside sweep over the now empty rocks, dumb witness of "The Union Eternal."

FRONTIER

THE BANDIT'S REDEMPTION (April 3). In the days of '49, when the rush for gold was on, Jim Rogers with his wife and their eight-year-old daughter Ruth were among the settlers who in prairie schooners drudged their weary way across the boundless plains. After weary days of travel they meet the Ward family, and are welcomed, where they camp for the night. It so transpires that a gang of treacherous bandits have hoisted their tents in the vicinity of the settlers' camping grounds. That night the settlers are attacked, and the bandit chief, after taking the locket from Mrs. Rogers' neck, takes the little girl and one of the Ward children with him, leaving the rest of the settlers for dead. The next morning the delirious mother is found by a kind-hearted Westerner, who takes her to his home to be cared for. Six months later, the bandit, for love of his adopted children, quits the outlaw life. Years pass on, and the mother mourns for her child, whom she believes dead. Ten years pass by. The outlaw chief, stricken with remorse, tells the children, now grown to man and womanhood, that he is not their father, but he is merely a reformed bandit. The children are horror-stricken, for he has been so good to them, and they have never known that he was other than their father. One day, while the boy and girl are at the village store buying groceries, etc., Mrs. Rogers, with the kind-hearted ranchwoman, come up to the store just as Ruth and her supposed brother are leaving. The mother recognizes her locket, and after many explanations, she finds her long lost daughter, whom she supposed to be dead. Later, Ruth and Joyn plead with the mother to forgive the reformed bandit, for he has been so good to them and is the only father they have ever known, and finally the mother, for her daughter's sake, forgives the bandit chief, whose wearied soul is now set at rest.

She dresses in madam's clothes and receives Joe. She reads his palm and he tries to flirt with her. However, after inducing him to give her a pin of his for future recollections, so to speak, she throws him out, where he falls over the surprised Chester, who is waiting in the hall for his turn with the seer. Pearl then beckons Chester to enter. She then proceeds to tell him all about his sweetheart and she is convinced that he is really in love with her, although he is ignorant of the fact that he is confiding his secrets to the one most anxious to hear. Just then a detective enters with a warrant for the fortune teller's arrest, alleging fraud, and insists on taking Pearl with him. Chester intervenes in her behalf, and just then the real fortune teller enters and is arrested. Pearl changes her clothes and goes with Chester. ALMOST A WINNER.—Belmont, unknown to his wife, attended a poker party. His wife thought he was at a lodge meeting, but as the hours flew by and he did not return, she went to bed. Belmont, having lost all his money, starts home. In the meantime, however, and just as Mrs. Belmont was about to fall asleep, she hears a noise in the room downstairs. It is "Slats" Keene, a burglar, who has gained entrance to the house. She goes downstairs and catches him looking into a closet. She throws him in and locks the door. She then rushes out and finds a policeman. "Slats," meanwhile, has taken off his coat, made a pillow of it, and has gone to sleep. Belmont returns and hears "Slats" snore. He opens the closet door and awakens "Slats." The latter gets up and grapples with Belmont, throws him into the closet and runs away, leaving his coat on the floor. The wife and policeman return and release Belmont, who explains, and is corroborated by Mrs. Belmont. The cop goes away and, turning a corner meets "Slats." Belmont meanwhile has gone through the coat and has found a large roll of bills, more than enough to offset his losses. He is happy until the officer returns with the crook and takes the money from him, the crook telling him about it and offering him half. However, the officer keeps all the money and takes "Slats" off to jail, leaving Belmont disconsolate and heartbroken, so nearly recompensed for his expensive "lodge meeting."

THE WIDOW'S FOLLY (April 2).—The widow disapproved of the foreman's attentions to her sister May, and welcomed the opportunity to send him on an important mission to the nearest town. To get there he is forced to pass through hostile country, where he sees a man being chased by Indians. He goes to the man's aid and draws the Indians off, but instead of waiting to help, the man, Seaton, leaves him to fight them alone. The foreman is badly wounded and left for dead until the morning, when a friendly half-breed rescues him, takes him to his hut, and nurses him through a long attack of fever. In the meanwhile Seaton has arrived at the ranch and made great headway with the widow, is made foreman, as the old foreman is thought to have taken French leave—and eventually proposes to the widow, and, in spite of all that the young sister can say, the widow accepts him of which he actifies his part. Seaton receives the following letter: "Friend Bill: You are certainly lucky. Separate the old girl from her coin as soon as possible. Show her the enclosed and I think that will turn the trick. Your old pard, Joe." The enclosed note reads as follows: "And I would advise her to withdraw her account immediately. I have a dead sure tip that there is to be a run on the bank within the next twenty-four hours. Don't lose a minute if you ——" and it did really work like a charm as Joe predicted. The widow at once started out with Seaton to withdraw her account, but fortunately left a half-signed check, which she has spilled ink upon, where May found it, so that the former foreman, who has recovered from his fever and just returned to the ranch, sets off with the boys to protect the widow in spite of herself by playing at being hold-up men and taking the bag of gold from her; then in searching Seaton they come upon Joe's letter, and, after advising Seaton to make himself scarce around that part of the country, they hurried back to the ranch to lay the gold and Joe's note at the widow's feet.

BACHELOR BILL'S BIRTHDAY PRESENT (April 4).—Bachelor Bill reminded of his birthday by a postcard from his brother, stands treat and makes a day of it. Edna Vale, a young widow with a baby, sick and almost starving, enters Bill's shack, and, finding it empty, decides to leave the baby, with an appeal that it be cared for. Bill comes home, finds the baby on his bed, and has a hard time looking after it, until he advertises in the post-office for a nurse girl.

Edna sees the ad and applies, and is joyfully accepted. Besides caring for the baby, she takes charge of the house, and Bill enjoys home comforts of which he never dreamed. His satisfaction gets a rude jolt, however, when Edna finds a note from the Vigilance Committee, objecting to Bill's mode of life and advising him if he wishes to avoid trouble to get rid of the pretty nurse or get a chaperone.

Bill expresses his opinion of the committee, but Edna, fearing trouble for him, decides to go. When it comes to leaving the baby, her mother heart fails her and she takes it along. Bill comes home, and starts after Edna—as he says, to get the baby. He finds Enda seated by the roadside crying from weariness and desolation. He asks for the baby. She refuses to give it up. Bill says it's his baby. Edna replies that it was hers first. Bill asks why the kid's father isn't looking after his womenfolks? Edna replies that he is dead.

Loath to give up the baby, Bill asks Edna to sit down till he thinks it over. The parson comes up the road on horseback and gives Bill an idea. He asks the parson if he wants a job. Hearing that he does, Bill invites him to marry him and Edna. She is tempted to run away, but a look at Bill convinces her that he would run after her if she did, so she gives in with good grace.

When, after the parson has ridden off, she and the baby are gathered into Bill's strong arms, she not only receives but returns his kisses.

AMERICAN ECLAIR

THE SUPERIOR LAW (Three Parts) (April 2).—"Gentlemen of the jury, the life of this man is in your hands. The evidence has been purely circumstantial. Should you convict him, each one of you will have committed the crime of murder."

It was a stirring speech—its effect upon the twelve jurors was plainly noticeable. It was not necessary to see the powerful form of this man who was pleading for the life of a human being to realize the virile strength and force of his personality.

Charley Rock had made a reputation as an attorney, and here was a case in which he was particularly interested, since the evidence was entirely circumstantial. When the jury returned a few minutes later, their verdict was "Not guilty, your honor," and the great throng in the courtroom crowded about Rock to offer their congratulations.

Down from the prisoner's box came Joe Baptiste, the poor, rough lumberjack whose life had been saved by Rock's forceful handling of this case, which seemed to be so plainly one of first degree murder. Baptiste fell on his knees to thank the attorney, but Rock and his wife passed out without waiting for any demonstration.

Charley Rock did not believe in convicting any man on purely circumstantial evidence. He had often discussed this matter with the district attorney, and it was due to this fact that he took up Baptiste's case after having become acquainted with the lumberjack one day while visiting the prison with his wife. Rock had often said that he believed in a "Superior Law," which made justificable certain sins, and his idea of things was that this "Superior Law" controlled the universe to the extent that it really developed circumstances as were necessary for the proper bringing about of justice to all.

Baptiste's case had been a peculiar one, in that the reason for the crime was a trifle unusual. One day, while calling at the little postoffice near his cabin, for his mail, Baptiste discovered a stranger forcing his attentions upon the beautiful little postmistress. The lumberjack knew Rosalie, the postmistress, only as a friend, but he rushed to her rescue and handled the stranger with the customary backwoods vigor. Later he met this stranger out in the woods, and when the brazen man insulted Joe, the lumberjack responded by using his knife. The visitor from the city was hurled over a precipice, at the foot of which he was later found dead.

Baptiste called at Rock's house the night after the trial to thank the attorney, but his savior did not care for any expression from the backwoodsman since he felt certain and, in fact, told him, that he was satisfied that he was actually guilty.

Charley little knew what an important part this particular law case would play in his future life.

A friend of Rock's, one Captain Morris, of the R. M. P., had been persistent in forcing his attentions upon Mrs. Rock. Rock suspected this, but he was not sure. He was not happy in his home life, and as a result turned to drink. In the course of his drinking he often frequented a roadhouse on the border of the great forest, where his fancy was taken by the beautiful daughter of the proprietor.

The discovery, one morning, that his wife's brother, whom he had often furnished with money, had forged his name to several checks, caused Rock to feel that he was certainly having more than his own share of burdens to carry. That day he accidentally discovered a note from Morris to his wife, in which Morris expressed his love for Mrs. Rock and referred to the attorney as a "common drunkard." That night Rock decided to make another trip to the roadhouse, despite the fact that the proprietor had ordered him from the place and told him never to return, owing to a quarrel betwen the attorney and the sweetheart of his daughter.

Charley was driven by his man to the roadhouse in his sleigh. As he opened the door on the scene of revelry, the entire company in the little wayside drinking place turned to see who this newcomer could be. Seeing Rock and knowing the previous trouble, the lumberjacks immediately began to discuss the possible ending of this remarkable visit.

Rock staggered forward and, pulling his little friend down to the table, he ordered champagne for himself and the proprietor's daughter. The bartender had just started to open the bottle when the big lumberjack who considered himself engaged to Rock's little friend opened the door. There was a tense moment, when the big backwoodsman strode forward to demand the meaning of this scene. Rock endeavored to explain, but was stunned by a terrible blow on the jaw. He was hurriedly carried to the window and thrown into the icy river below. Swept down by the current, the attorney was carried into an eddy, where he managed to climb up on the snow-covered bank. Here he fainted and lay unconscious in the white drift.

Fortunately for Rock, he was found, half dead, a few hours later, by Joe Baptiste, the man whose life he had saved. Joe carried him to his dog sled and hurried away to his cabin in the wilderness. Here he was given careful attention, and the lumberjack ran to the village to ask the assistance of the little postmistress in caring for the unfortunate man.

When Rock recovered consciousness his memory was gone. The blow on the head had fractured his skull, and he could not remember even his name.

The tender care of the beautiful little nurse in the next few days created a newborn love in the soul of this man who was beginning life over again.

Baptiste noticed this and, being a believer in the doctrine of living your own life without being shackled by the fetters of convention, he did not tell the little postmistress what he knew of the life of this handsome young giant.

Until the doctor from Montreal arrived Rosalie was almost constantly at the bedside of the injured man. Baptiste saw a newspaper story which said it was generally thought that the well-known attorney, Charley Rock, had been killed in a saloon brawl, and this only strengthened his thought that, after all, this man would be better off to be given a chance to begin his life all over again here in the great forest.

The doctor immediately informed Joe that his friend was suffering from a slight fracture of the skull and that a delicate operation would undoubtedly restore him to a normal condition. A few days after the operation, when Charley regained his strength, his memory returned. After the first few moments, when he was trying to place his surroundings, he picked up the newspaper which Joe had brought from the village, and there, in big type, he saw the glaring headlines telling of his disgraceful disappearance and death, and then came to him the recollection of the last few weeks of happiness here in the forest with the beautiful little Rosalie. Feeling himself disgraced in the eyes of the world, where he had been so unhappy, Rock resolved to remain here in this woodland beauty spot with his friend Baptiste.

He took up the occupation of wood carver and assisted Joe in making the little crosses and figures of the Virgin Mary, for which Baptiste found such a ready sale in the village. But even in this faraway spot there were meddlers. It seems that one can hardly get to the end of the world without finding someone who must need pry into affairs that do not concern them.

A few residents of that section began to gather at the postoffice and discuss the apparent intimacy of Rosalie and the handsome stranger in Baptiste's cabin. The result was that a marriage was forced between the two. Rock felt that this was a serious step, since he was already married, but he decided finally to take the chance of being able to live here in the forest contented and happy, without his former world ever knowing but what he had been killed in the saloon brawl.

Back at Charley's home, Captain Morris had lost no time in making love to the attorney's wife. He promptly usurped Rock's place in the household. Mrs. Rock's brother had been going steadily downward, following the disappearance of the attorney and, being without the money which he had formerly secured from Rock, he became a common desperado and a fugitive from justice. Fleeing from the officers, he took refuge in the home of Rock, where he was assisted in escaping by Captain Morris.

The fugitive, by chance, made his way to the village on the border of the forest where he heard of the presence of a handsome stranger at Baptiste's cabin. Knowing that Baptiste had, at one time, been done such a great service by Rock, the desperado suspected that there might be some connection between this handsome stranger and the attorney who had disappeared. He made his way to the cabin and arrived just after the marriage ceremony had been performed. He confronted Rock and his beautiful bride and told the attorney he would withhold his knowledge from the world if given the family jewels, which he knew were safely hidden in Rock's old home.

Rock refused to listen to any such demand, but Rosalie insisted that she know what this man meant. Oversome by remorse, Charley admitted the terrible wrong he had done her. The shock was too much for little Rosalie and she staggered under the blow, to be caught up by Baptiste, who carried her to his room, where he made her comfortable, while he hurried for a doctor.

Leaving a note for Rosalie, begging her forgiveness, and promising to send to her the family jewels, so that she would never need to want, Rock left the cabin and hurriedly made his way back to his old home in the city.

It was now a race between the attorney and his brother-in-law to reach the house and secure the fortune of jewels. Jack reached the house first, but had hardly entered by the window before he heard the approach of Rock. Hidden behind the portiere he was watching the attorney open the secret hiding place of the jewels when both were startled to hear someone descending the stairway.

Rock stepped behind the bookcase to see his wife in her nightdress apparently walking in her sleep. Straight out through the door went the white figure, out into the snow. The attorney hurriedly followed, but not in time, for his wife went tumbling over the great embankment near the house, and he could see, far below, the little figure lying bleeding in the snow. He made his way as rapidly as he could to the ravine below, but the unfortunate woman was dead. Seeing some of the servants approaching, he made his way back to the house and secreted himself till after his wife's body had been brought in. Here, he confronted his brother-in-law, who, having witnessed his sister's terrible death, weakened as he saw before him the powerful form of Rock. Shaken by the presence of death, Jack hurled his revolver from him and left the house with the resolve to try to lead a better life.

Rock slipped out of the old home unseen and made his way back to the little cabin by the big waterfall, deep in the silent forest, where he found the beautiful Rosalie waiting. To Rock it seemed, indeed, that "The Superior Law" had freed him from the bonds of the world in which he had been so unhappy and opened the door for a future in this clean, beautiful, snow-covered forest.

THE ROMANCE OF A FISHERBOY (March 31).—Peggy, a young and beautiful girl about nineteen years of age, was lured, ruined and then cast aside by a man of great wealth, about forty-five years of age, who makes it a bad habit to win and lure young girls. Peggy, realizing that his love was false, wanders to the seashore, and, in a state of desperation, attempts to drown herself. While wandering on the beach she is seen by a fisherboy and he, suspecting her intentions, follows her and rescues her from drowning. The fisherboy's innocent attentions toward her arouse a new spirit in her. He falls desperately in love with Peggy. After a year's marriage, Peggy becomes tired of a daily monotony of being the wife of a fisherboy. One day while the fisherboy is out on a fishing trip, Peggy aimlessly strolls along the beach and by accident meets the other man, who with his friend, is out motoring.

He again becomes infatuated with her. He, pointing out her different environments, pleads with her to give up her chosen life of poverty and return to him and lead a life of luxury. She yields. He tells her to make ready and he will return within an hour. She leaves for the hut to make preparations to leave, and in the meantime the fisherboy finds occasion to return. He enters just as Peggy is about to start. Realizing her intentions, he demands an explanation. Peggy mockingly tells him the truth, and it arouses his passionate anger to such a pitch that he tries to kill her. At that moment the other man appears in the doorway and Peggy leaves with him. On board the man's private yacht bound for New York, he attempts to make love to her. Peggy knowing his love to be false, realizes her mistake and cries for help. He, mocking, assures her that her cries will not be heard as he is master here.

The fisherboy realizing that she has deserted him, becomes much downcast and wanders aimlessly in a bewildered manner to the beach. He gets into his fishing boat, and, with head buried in his hands, overcome by grief, he drifts with the tide out to sea. He, hearing cries from the yacht approaching him, makes for it. Discovering that it is Peggy in danger, he climbs up the side of the yacht and throws the man to one side as the crew rush on him. He holds them at bay, giving Peggy time to jump overboard; he then makes a flying dive over the rail of the yacht after Peggy. He swims with her to his fishing boat, which is drifting near by, and rows to shore.

Peggy, realizing the greater and purer life, pleads for forgiveness, he forgiving her, takes her in his arms and they enter the hut together.

WHEN LINCOLN WAS PRESIDENT (March 27).—Mrs. Scott, a widow, has a son Ben and a nephew Will. Ben enlists for the war and his mother is prostrated with the news. Will tells his aunt that he will enlist and watch over her boy. Six months elapse and Ben is taken ill while on picket duty. Unknown to the authorities, Will takes his place, and the arduous duty of double watch makes him fall asleep on his post. The officer of the watch discovers this and Will is arrested tried by court-martial and sentenced to be shot. Ben is delirious and is carried to the hospital, and is unaware of his cousin's danger. Will writes to his aunt explaining his position and Mrs. Scott makes up her mind to go to Washington and appeal to President Lincoln to save him. She has great difficulty in obtaining an audience with Lincoln as his private secretary refuses to allow her to enter. Lincoln overhears the altercation, comes to the ante-room and takes Mrs. Scott into his library. There the poor woman tells the story of her nephew's devotion and begs Lincoln to save him. The boy's devotion touches Lincoln's heart and he determines to save him. With Mrs. Scott he travels to the execution ground, arriving just in time to save Will, who is facing the firing party. Lincoln pardons Will saying that the army needs men like him. This story is taken from an incident in Lincoln's life and is historically true in every particular.

FIDDLER PETE (April 3).—An unbending, stern Christian father, whose creed can countenance no failing, has two sons, Arthur and Peter. The elder, Pete, is a happy-go-lucky fellow, beloved the countryside over for his good nature and for his skill in playing the violin. The younger, Arthur, is the pride of his father's life and has just returned from his first year at college, where he is being educated for the ministry. A sister is a meek, good child, who favors her father, and the mother a good-natured woman, who secretly loves the ne'er-do-well, but fears her husband too much to show her preference openly.

Finding his elder son swimming on the Sabbath day while he and Arthur are returning from church, he upbraids Pete, and later finding him playing the violin for a dance of the village folk, the father storms at Pete publicly and tries to break his fiddle, which is too much for the good-natured boy, who, in a sudden fit of temper, knocks his father down and leaves his home for good.

Pete, wandering about the country, sustains himself mentally and physically with the fiddle, and at length lands in a mountain camp where the sole musical feature of the daily life is supplied by Maggie, the daughter of the hotelkeeper, who is the apple of his eyes. Pete falls in love with Maggie, and she with him, but she realizes that he is hopeless and can never be of any account. Pete worships her from afar, as does the waif Billy, whom Pete has picked up in his wanderings, and who now travels with Pete and who adores him.

Later, the brother, Arthur, now a full-fledged minister of the gospel, is sent to the camp and succeeds in making one convert—the girl Maggie—whom he falls in love with. Arthur persuades her that her life is evil amid such associates as her father's barroom affords. The girl is flattered by his attentions, and overcome by his learning. The minister persuades the girl to come and play for his meeting, thereby drawing all the trade away from the saloon. This angers the hotelkeeper and he forbids Maggie to see the minister again.

She does see him again, and, while he is praying with her to forsake her father and give her heart to God, a friend tells the hotelkeeper, who sees them in the distance and goes back for his gun to wreck vengeance upon the minister.

Billy, however, has seen and heard all. He runs to tell Pete, who has never met the minister and does not know that Arthur is his brother. Pete runs out to meet the girl, reaches the pair first, starts to whip the minister. They recognize each other. The pursuers are coming. Pete helps them to escape by a change of costumes, whereby he attracts the attention of the avengers, and Maggie and Arthur get away in safety to the next camp, where they are married. Pete, his heart weakened by his drinking excesses, falls and is captured. Pete, dying, asks after the girl, and Billy goes out to find her. Coming to the other camp, he finds the minister and tries to choke the life out of him for what he has done to Pete. He is stopped by Maggie.

They start on the back trail and reach Pete in time to receive his forgiveness, and the agreement of the hotelkeeper to allow the minister to remain. Pete's dying request to the hotel man is to quit the business for good. He dies in the arms of Maggie and with his brother at his side. At the grave the minister and Maggie and the father and Billy form a little compact, and walk home past the barroom, now placarded "Gone Out of Business For Good."

GREAT NORTHERN

FRED AS A SOLDIER.—Fred decides to become a soldier, but as a matter of fact he lacks most of the requirements necessary to stand as a bulwark against his country's foes. He is stout and healthy enough and for this reason he is admitted to the army, but he lacks courage and in the end this proves to be his downfall. The story is built around wholesome comedy lines and the fun is calculated to keep the average audience in the best of good humor from the moment the film is shown until its conclusion. Fred first makes himself the laughing stock of the army by failing to make good at the trials of strength and agility. In jumping the horses of the gymnasium he is a positive failure, and when called upon to climb a rope he calls for assistance before being able to meet the requirements. But in spite of his failings he is admitted to the ranks of the privates and carries himself with dignity until he is ordered to take his turn at target practice. On the rifle range he tries to perform the almost impossible feat of shooting at the target with his back turned from the bullseye and he retires from the field in disgrace. But it remains for Fred to further humiliate himself when, during the army manœuvres, he retreats from the field under fire and proceeds to take a little nap at the side of a tree, after removing one of his boots in order to give the impression that he has been wounded. When he is carried to the barracks, the commanding officers decide that he is not a fit person for active service in the army, and, in consequence, he is dismissed. Then he rejoins his wife and comes to a realization that marital relations are more to his liking than martial occupation.

On the same reel is a beautiful scenic entitled "Summer in the North," the views being taken off the coast of Jutland, Denmark. In this subject the onlooker is given a most vivid glance at the beauties of the Scandinavian coast.

RELIANCE

THE GRAFTERS (March 22).—John Hascom, contractor, shows worry and dejection over the condition of his business. A checking of the yearly reports, prepared by his attractive bookkeeper, shows an alarming condition of affairs and Hascom sees no prospect of his dearest wish being consummated.

Alva Bennet, the bookkeeper, occupies a closer place in her employer's mind than that of mere business aid. John Hascom has hoped that a good business year will place his fiances in a position, where he may change his office assistant to his life partner, but his books show such an alarming shortage that John is forced to curb his love declaration to Alva and wait for better times.

Miss Bennet is fully aware of the badly concealed love of her employer and suffers as keenly as he. She has hoped for his declaration and sees that only financial matters are keeping them apart. She tries to cheer him up to fresh efforts in his business, but the man seems to have lost his grip.

Alva shows him an advertisement in the daily paper for a large contract for street work, and asks him why he does not bid. John tells her that only political friends of the administration will be considered. Alva, not convinced, persuades him to file a bid anyway, and she succeeds in getting him to figure on the work and prepare his bid, which must be filed before three o'clock that day. She works feverishly to finish the typewritten work and get it down to the City Hall before the closing time for the acceptance of the bids. John smiles at the enthusiasm and knows it is all in vain, he is outside the ring and his bid will never be considered. He leaves the office to attend to outside business and Alva rushes to complete her hastily-prepared bid. She sends it by the office boy who arrives at the City Hall with Alva's sealed document. The clock points to 2:30 and the boy is refused the filing of his bid. He is told by the clerk that all bids have been received and opened and the contract awarded.

The boy goes back and tells Alva that she is too late. The loyal girl sees the advertised time is not yet up and determines to fight for a fair chance. She rushes to the City Hall, capturing a reporter of a Progressive paper, and drags the surprised man to the clerk's desk, where she demands a chance to file her bid. Pointing to the clock, which points to three minutes to three, she shows the ad in the paper which holds the filing time until three o'clock. She tells the political friends of the contractor that she will have a fair deal and the reporter stands by ready to get a graft story for his paper. Alva is sneered at by the clerk and told that the bids have gone before the Board of Supervisors in the next room. She, dragging the reporter with her, braves the supervisors and demands reading of her bid. They try to set her aside, but an elderly man, noted for his adherence to clean politics, listens to the girl and sees time is not yet up. He demands a square deal and reading of the girl's bid. The great discrepancy in the price of her bid and the others starts a crusade for cleaner government by an article of the reporter's in the paper, enabling men like John Hascom to share in the city's work. The large contract enables Alva's employer to tell her the long-cherished secret, and at three minutes to three, John Hascom and Alva Bennet spoke the words that made them man and wife.

HIS DAY OF FREEDOM (March 26).—In the shipping-room of the penitentiary, No. 333 is secretly nailed up in a wooden box by the convicts and shipped as a box of prison-made shoes to a store at Freeport-by-the-Sea.

The clerk who opens the case is knocked senseless by the convict, who, appropriating a long store coat, goes his way, to get mixed in the love affair of Betty Jones, who tends store for her father, a fisherman. Crouching between a hedge and a side window, No. 333 sees Jones, who has just made a sale of fish, hand over to Betty a roll of bills, which she places in a tin box on a shelf of a window near the watcher. Jones departs and Betty runs to the open door to greet her sweetheart, Paul Kimball, giving the convict an opportunity to reach in and secure the tin box. Skulking into the rear window he peers into Betty's kitchen. Hunger tempts him to enter. But Betty's merry impulse to make Paul shopkeeper while she tidies her kitchen, gives the intruder no time to escape, so he hides in the wood-box. Felix Hill, an undesired suitor, enters the store, and, perceiving his successful rival, starts ridiculing the sub-clerk. Betty, to replenish the kitchen fire, mechanically lifts the cover of the wood-box, but with attention so strained toward the quarreling men, she fails to see the wicked face glaring up at her. At the sound of blows she drops the heavy cover and stuns the convict. Dragging Paul off his victim, she angrily ejects them both. Then turning to the wood-box she discovers the dazed occupant. On assisting him out his convict suit is exposed but his helpless condition arouses her sympathy, and at his entreaties she gives him food. Meanwhile the shoe clerk regains consciousness and his thrilling tale starts a village mob in pursuit of the convict. No. 333 hearing their approach, begs Betty's protection, and in terror and sympathy she shields him and the pursuers depart. Real gratitude is felt by the hardened criminal as Betty lets him depart, well disguised in an old fisherman's suit of her father's. During this time Felix has sought Betty's father with an account of the beating received at the latter's store. They return, where Jones roundly scolds his daughter, and, on discovering his loss, demands the tin box of the amazed Betty.

An idea of revenge strikes Felix. He deliberately lies. "I saw Paul put a tin box in his pocket." The accusation sends Jones rushing to the constable. The convict, now safely disguised as one of the fishermen standing about the constable's, enjoys the excitement of his non-capture. Suddenly Jones appears before the justice demanding the arrest of Paul, who is present, for the theft, with Felix as eye witness. As Paul is led away Betty rushes up, and, on witnessing the anguish and despair of his benefactress, No. 333 is seized with the first unselfish impulse of his wicked life. After an inward struggle, he tears off his rubber coat and stands—the self-exposed convict. Handing over the tin box he exonerates Paul and utterly confuses the lying Felix. So ends his one day of freedom.

MAJESTIC

THE WRONG MISS WRIGHT (March 23).—Miss Priscilla Brown, a spinster of forty, leaves a book on a bench in the waiting-room of a railway station. Flora Wright finds it there and is looking at it when Frank Allen comes up and sits down beside her. He is evidently much taken with her. Their train is called and Flora hurries out leaving the book where she found it. Frank thinking she has forgotten it, pockets it and follows her. They take the same train and Priscilla boards it also.

On the train Frank makes several attempts to start a conversation with Flora, but is snubbed. Priscilla, on the contrary, goes out of her way to be agreeable, much to his annoyance.

Arriving in New York, Frank orders his cabman to follow Flora's cab, only to find that through the cabman's mistake he has followed Priscilla. In his hotel room he suddenly remembers the book in his overcoat pocket, and, opening it, reads the inscription: "To Miss Priscilla Brown from Stephen Ellis, New York." Happening to know Stephen Ellis, Frank writes him a note, requesting an introduction to Miss Priscilla Brown, but before the note is sent he sees in a newspaper that Ellis is on his way home from Europe aboard the Lusitania. He tears up the note and despairs of ever seeing Flora again.

Frank sails for Europe several days later and is delighted to find Flora among the passengers and considerably annoyed to find Priscilla, who promptly renews her attentions. He tries to make Flora's acquaintance in the way in vogue on shipboard, but she discourages every advance.

The Lusitania is sighted. Passengers crowd to the deck. Frank, suddenly recalling the fact that Stephen Ellis is aboard her has an idea. He sends a wireless telegram to Ellis demanding an introduction by wireless to Miss Priscilla Brown. A satisfactory reply comes back and Frank sends it with the book to Flora by a steward.

Flora takes the book and telegram, but when she reads the address on the latter she hands it back and points out Priscilla, who is standing near. Priscilla receives the message with delight and sends the steward for Frank. Flora suddenly discovers that she has kept the book, starts toward Priscilla with it, when its appearance strikes her as familiar and, pausing to examine it, she recognizes it as the one she had seen in the railway station. Instantly the situation becomes clear to her and she laughs with great amusement, and is hardly able to conceal her merriment when Frank, making eagerly for her, is waylaid by Priscilla. As they go out together Flora, with a sly smile, hides the book behind her and follows them.

Flora is standing at the deck rail waiting for them as they come around the deck, Priscilla chatting animatedly and Frank the picture of dejection. Flora steps up as they are about to pass her and gives the book to Priscilla, explaining how she happened to have it. Priscilla introduces Flora to Frank. While Priscilla is exclaiming in surprise over the book, the young couple chat and presently, forgetting Priscilla, they turn their backs on her and stroll off absorbed in each other. Priscilla is left for the closing picture, standing deserted, looking after them puzzled, as she looks from the book to the telegram, not understanding the situation.

THE PRIMA DONNA'S CAT (March 25).—A beautiful Persian cat, of great value, owned and much prized by an opera singer, becomes lost in the most mysterious manner. The opera singer is very much surprised and upset over its loss and hires the services of a private detective to find it.

Her maid, who has been accused of carelessness because she failed to stay awake when she was supposed to have been taking care of the cat, in her efforts to help them out, originates a fictitious story to the effect that she is almost sure she saw a man wearing a green necktie appear and steal the cat.

Now, it seems that across the hall from the opera singer's apartment lives an old bachelor, who is very much enamored of another popular actress, who also has a cat which is not as valuable as the Persian, and of which she is inclined to be jealous. Immediately on learning these facts from the opera singer, the detective places his suspicions on the old bachelor. The suspicions are strengthened by the fact that the detective learns that the old man has ordered milk.

After a series of events, during which the poor bachelor and his sweetheart are put under the ban of suspicion, it is discovered that the old bachelor's valet has spilled ink on his master's waistcoat, which accounts for the milk episode, thus obliterating the detective's most important clue.

The detective, thus foiled in what he thought was a wonderful discovery, tries every ridiculous method possible to find the cat. However, the cat is finally found by the opera singer's fiance under the bath tub, waiting patiently for a mouse to appear.

"THE RENEGADE'S HEART"

(Release Monday, Mar. 31, 1913.) A strong Western. A renegade, hunted by posse and saved by a girl, promises to return the kindness. He does so with his life. Photography clear, stereoscopic—acting convincing and interesting. A splendid offering.

"MATCHES"

(Release Thursday, April 3, 1913.) A screamingly funny farce-drama concerning the uphappy situation of a match-making mother. A genuinely funny picture, featuring Kerrigan and Van Trump. You will like it.

"THE MUTE WITNESS"

(Release Saturday, April 5, 1913.) A bully Western story, replete with adventure and splendid situations. How a wild game photographer brought a crime to light and saved a woman's honor. 1 and 3 sheets with this subject.

3 CALIFORNIA-MADE PICTURES EACH WEEK

ONE EVERY WEEK

To the Trade:

"Lincoln for the Defense" was so well received by the trade, we decided to put out another Lincoln picture, and our release of March 27th is so much better than the first one, we are glad we did so. It is historically accurate in every particular; has strong dramatic situations; and is full of pathos and heart interest.

You will like our release of April 3rd. For a long time we had been trying to give the trade a very fine military picture, and we were fortunate in getting a good scenario for this film. It is a picture which will appeal to all.

THE OPERATOR

REGARDING the question of fires and the operator's booth, quite a lot of interesting matter came in to me in reference to the same, and the cry of the operator went up from several sources. One letter deserving of special attention is as follows:

Dear Sir:

In the February 15th edition of the Moving Picture News you write under the article of "A Small Boy and a Large Panic," that you advocate the glass covers in all apertures of the moving picture booth for the safety of the public. I agree with you, every exhibitor should see that his place is fireproof; he should see that the public are not in danger of a panic; but, how about the operator?

Don't you think that his health should be safeguarded as well? Is it not a fact that almost 75% of moving picture booths are without proper ventilation? Is it not also a fact that the only fresh air that gets into the booth is though the apertures? Now, what chance does the operator stand with all the apertures covered with glass? I think you should give the operator some consideration in this matter.

Hoping you will give this letter some of your valuable time and space. Yours truly,

AN OPERATOR.

"An Operator" certainly voices a strong plea for the rank and file, of the "men behind the machine," and I candidly admit something should be done, and done very quickly, to allow proper breathing space. I have been an advocate for the safety and convenience of the operator, and as his health is of prime importance to himself and his family I think that should be safeguarded. It is getting to be a serious problem with the operator as to what he can do to preserve his health. Only the most robust can withstand the strain under which they are working, and when I observe the number that are in the first or second stages of consumption I often wonder where it will end. The breathing of the carbon dust is a very great detriment to the operator, and the heat from the arc makes it almost impossible for him to be comfortable while attending to his work, owing to the fact that the booth must be close shut, and, as "An Operator" remarks, 75 per cent. of the booths have no ventilation. This is absolutely wrong. The booths should be made not only fireproof, but capable of thorough ventilation. There should always be an intake and an outflow of pure air. This can be accomplished by a proper grating at the bottom of the booth and a ventilating fan with an exhaust pipe at the top. This would insure always a fresh supply of pure air into the booth.

I am perfectly well aware the Board of Fire Underwriters and the Fire Department have made it very hard to overcome the difficulties of poor ventilation, but if the matter is brought to their notice by a few strong, pertinent remarks or letters, and the attention of the Board of Health called to the condition under which the operator works, I think the solution would be very speedy, and that not only the safety of the public be assured by the glass in front of the booth, but the operator's comfort also taken into consideration by a properly ventilated booth.

CINEMATOGRAPH FIRES

COMING again to the question of the booth and its safety, I quote from an editorial I wrote in my issue of May 27, 1911, in which I said:

We wonder if the trade fully realize the very small percentage of fires brought about by Cinematography. Our London correspondent in the May 13th issue gave the following significant fact:

Out of 3,208 fires which occurred in the area of the London County Council in 1910 only seven were at picture exhibitions which is 109/500 or 1/5th of 1 per cent. Noting these figures for London, a correspondent gives us the figures for New York City. Out of 4,032 fires in 1910 only two were caused by Cinematograph films and the damage infinitesimally small.

In New York State the fires for 1910 were 11,098, and out of this large proportion only five were caused by films. We tried to verify these figures from Mr. Forsyth, of the Board of Fire Underwriters; he happened to be engaged in court at the time so we could not reach him. If these figures are near correct, is it not time the cry of Fire! Fire! Danger!!! and the glaring scare headlines in the press should be eliminated, and due credit be given to the careful handling of the films and the safety devices used by the machine manufacturers; if only the cigarette fiend could be eliminated, we would soon hear the last of Cinematography being put in the most dangerous class of fire causers. Will our readers bring these facts before their local editors and get them to give as large a publicity to them as they do when one poor little fire breaks out through the carelessness of the cigarette boy, or the school product who bridges a fuse? By so doing they will earn the thanks of all in the industry.

And now, in addition to the above and thoroughly up to date, I get the following figures for 1912 from the department of the State Fire Marshal in Albany. With a large amount of laborious work the records were examined for me so that the full, specific details might be given. I am more than thankful to the Department and to Mr. George F. Roesch, the First Deputy Fire Marshal, for the work done. Out of a total of 8,165 fires in the State, 9 were in moving picture houses. This is outside Greater New York. From Greater New York, which includes Manhattan, Bronx, Brooklyn, Queens and Richmond counties, the number of fires was 15,633, and the number of fires in Cinematograph theatres was 19, and these could be reduced to a much smaller percentage with careful manipulation on the part of the operator, but from these fires, as is well known to my readers, the small boy crying "Fire!" is the chief factor to be taken care of.

Another growing habit which I view with great alarm, and (while it may be trenching upon the liberty of the subject or personality or the liberty of gross selfishness) will, unless curbed, quickly be the source of a great deal of trouble in the theatres. Many theatres in New York are now abandoning the legitimate and installing moving pictures in their places, and the inveterate smoker is being catered to by giving him open house and allowing him to smoke in the balcony and gallery, to the great annoyance and insult to the ladies. What would happen in one of these crowded theatres, and they are crowded to capacity, if during a dark period some smoker flared up a match and the small boy immediately cried out "Fire!" more especially if this smoker happened to be near the booth?

Putting aside the question of the liberty of the subject, I think the smoker should be prohibited from these houses and thus eliminate every atom, even the remotest relation, to fire from the moving picture theatre.

Alfred H. Saunders.

WEST VIRGINIA STATE BRANCH NO. 6, OF THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

The fourth annual West Virginia State convention is to be held at Wheeling, W. Va., on April 15 and 16, 1913, and to say that it will be a big success, is putting it very mildly. Clem Kerr, of Dayton, Ohio, the organizer, together with L. R. Thomas, the state secretary, have surrounded themselves with a coterie of live-wire exhibitors from Wheeling district, including a great number of exhibitors from across the Ohio River in Ohio. The beautiful new auditorium which has just been opened to the public will be the home of the West Virginia convention.

Manufacturers of moving picture accessories will make no mistake in having an exhibit at this convention as Wheeling is so well located that it will command the attendance of hundreds of exhibitors from a wide area and from a number of sister states. Many manufacturers have already contracted for exhibit space, but owing to the immense size of the auditorium there will be ample room for all exhibits.

The auditorium is so arranged that all visitors passing to and from the hall will see the exhibits. Many important matters will be taken up at this convention such as legislation governing taxes and licenses, a state examination board for operators, and a state Sunday opening law. A bill for a stricter censorship on pictures will also be discussed.

It is extremely essential that all exhibitors in the state attend this convention as matters of vital importance will come up. An election of all the state officers and the selecting of delegates to the national convention at New York will take place.

FIGHTS FOR FILM EXCHANGE

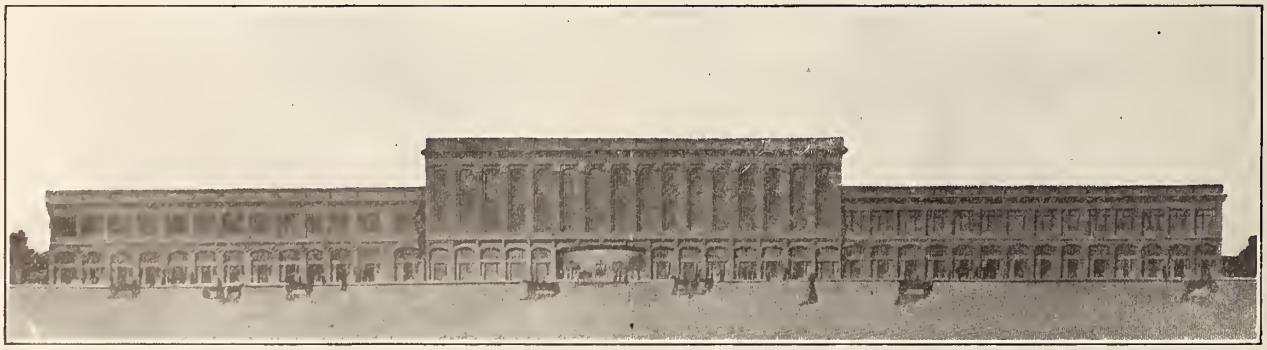
J. W. Morgan, head of the Morgan Film Exchange, which was ousted from its offices at 804 Pine street, Monday, by private detectives employed by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company of New York, arrived in St. Louis yesterday from Kansas City and announced he would begin a fight to regain control of his business.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat says:

"He already had filed suit for $250,000 against the New York concern, but would not divulge what other steps he intended to take until after conferring with his attorney. He registered at the Stratford Hotel and said he would conduct his business there until he could make other arrangements. The difference between the concerns is said to be an outgrowth of a proposition of the New York company to take over the Morgan business."

"HER BIG STORY" NEWSPAPER PLAY TO BE RELEASED WITH MAGAZINE ISSUE CONTAINING STORY

"Her Big Story" is the title of a two-reel subject which the American Film Manufacturing Company has just completed at its Western studio. This story was purchased from the Street & Smith Publishing Company and will be released by the American on or close to the date of its appearance in the Popular Magazine. This general plan will be followed by the "Flying A" forces in similar cases.



BEAUTIFUL NEW AUDITORIUM AT WHEELING, W. VA., WHERE STATE CONVENTION WILL BE HELD

EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

April 8, 1913, Exhibitors' Day has been endorsed by the exhibitors throughout the country, and every state is heartily in accord with the sentiment and action of The National vice-presidents in selecting April 8th as Exhibitors' Day, a day on which all members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will heartily support by contributing the amount of 5 per cent to their own state organization and 5 per cent to the National Organization. The small amount contributed by the members will never be felt by them and will place both the state and national organization in a position to do even more effective work than has been done heretofore. The officers of the league deserve great credit for financing the national organization so efficiently and economically. In fact, there is no other organization that has ever been financed on so small an amount of money as the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and made such a grand success.

The books of the league are open at all times to every member; itemized statements are made at every convention, and an auditing committee appointed to audit the books. In fact, it has caused a great many to wonder how an organization of such gigantic strength has been able to survive upon the small amount of money that it has taken to bring about such splendid results.

Every member throughout the United States and Canada should make a special effort to feature Exhibitors' Day. Western Canada reports that every member in the dominion will be only too glad to contribute their mite to the organization. Letters are pouring into headquarters from every state in the Union, stating that they are only too pleased to have an opportunity to contribute to a cause that means so much for the uplift and protection of the motion picture business.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is now recognized as one of the greatest powers in the United States; the strength and force of the screen will become more apparent to all as the organization grows with each added state, bearing evidence of the desire and firm determination of all motion picture exhibitors to stand and co-operate together for mutual protection and the uplifting of the greatest educator, amusement and advanced civilizer the world has ever known, the motion picture.

Let every member of our organization come forward, whether it be a small or a large amount and assist in welding together all the interests of our business, and to assist in bringing about harmony, co-operation and providing means whereby a strong, vigorous campaign can be made whereby each and every individual member of our organization will receive a square deal.

ALABAMA ORGANIZED

Exhibitors There Favor Exposition

The following telegram was received on Tuesday evening by Mr. Frank A. Tichenor, chairman of the First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, from M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America:

"Alabama organized. Forty-seven members. Following officers elected: Mr. A. A. Wall, Birmingham, national vice-president; Mr. E. H. Colley, Birmingham, president; Mr. T. S. Abernathy, Birmingham, second vice-president; Mr. R. T. Wilby, Selma, second vice-president; Mr. John H. Snyder, Bessemer, treasurer; Mr. J. G. Wells, Anniston, secretary. (Signed) M. A. Neff."

In his address in the banquet room of the Hillman Hotel, Mr. Neff told those present the following facts:

"This is my first visit to Birmingham. From what I have seen of your city it impressed me very much. As to the motion picture, all I can say is what everybody knows, that it is the greatest business of the world today; the greatest educational force, the greatest force for the establishment of needed reforms, and the greatest force for the moral uplift of education in the world. For instance, who ever dreamed two years ago that China, ruled by cruelest despotism, would become a republic as it is to-day. The motion picture is the answer. All the teachings and prayers of the missionary were good for the heathen Chinese, but it was not until the arrival of the motion picture that millions of Chinese were able to see the progress of the western world. The skyscrapers of New York, the architectural beauties of Europe and the ways of educated white people. Motion picture men the world over should feel proud that to them belongs much of the credit of this great reform.

"The nicel and dime novel so popular 10 years ago, has not survived the competition of the motion picture. Out of 150 of these fiery publications only eight are now being published. This number will soon be reduced. The consumption of beer and whiskey in the United States since the motion picture came in vogue has fallen of 32 per cent. Criminal statistics throughout the country have fallen off 28 per cent, and it is claimed that cigarette smoking has been greatly reduced. All owing to the influence of educational pictures. The motion picture men are not content with the success already achieved, but are daily striving to better the films and to provide greater amusement and better theatres for the public."

In explaining the aims of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, which stands for the uplifting of the industry as a whole, the theme of his talk was, "United we stand, divided we fall."

He spoke about the third annual convention and the First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, explaining that never before in the history of the industry has the exhibitor been accorded the opportunity of seeing all the up-to-date contrivances pertaining to the business. As explained by Mr. Neff, all the largest manufacturers in this country and Europe have arranged to exhibit their products to the 10,000 motion picture theatre owners who will attend the convention.

He ended his talk by urging all exhibitors to join the league and work for the uplifting of the indsutry and fair legislation.

From the manner in which the exhibitors received Mr. Neff's address it would seem that there will be a number of representatives from Alabama in New York on July 7. The work of furthering both the convention and the exposition is being hustled right along, and from the headquarters of the exposition comes the news that there is very little space left on the main floor of the New Grand Central Palace.

FIRST ANNUAL BALL OF PENNSYLVANIA STATE BRANCH M. P. E. L. OF AMERICA

Under the auspices of the Pennsylvania State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, there was held at Turners Hall, Broad and Columbia streets, Philadelphia, Pa., on Wednesday night, March 26th, the first annual ball of that state branch. To say the least "it was some ball."

To Walter Stuempfig, National vice-president and member of the Philadelphia local go the honors of making it so great a success. An orchestra of sixty pieces furnished music for 4,000 merrymakers, composed of hundreds of pretty girls and their escorts. The whole affair was such a big success that another one is promised in the near future. Everybody there said they had the best time of their life, and no one wanted to go home.

New York was well represented by manufacturers, players, exchange men, etc.

Darwin Karr, of the Solax Company, delivered a monologue which made the Philadelphians take notice, but the real hit in the vaudeville part of the entertainment which comprised many well known vaudeville stars, and players well known on the screen, was made by Kenneth Casey, the clever juvenile star of the Vitagraph Company.

Many of those present thought, and gave voice to their opinion, that young Mr. Casey would be the riot in big time vaudeville. Many pictures were shown upon the screen. "The Tempest," a new Solax feature was especially well liked. A funny incident happened after the picture had been run. The operator and representatives from the Solax Company in receiving congratulations from their friends forgot to keep an eye on the reels, and when finally some one thought of going home it was discovered that some wise guy in the sleepy town had copped the reels.

State officials from the neighboring states were warmly welcomed at a banquet held at the Touraine Hotel. Automobiles met representatives who attended and those who returned to New York early Thursday morning claimed that Philadelphia is quite some burg.

Aside from having a good time much business was accomplished by Mr. Trigger and Mr. Tichenor. After the ball several committee meetings were held by representatives from different states. Mr. Tichenor, chairman of the committee of directors of the First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, which will be held at the New Grand Central Palace, July 7th to 12th, 1913, made an address telling of the wonderful progress being made by the committee. After congratulating the officials on the great success of their entertainment he said in part: "With very few exceptions all the well-known manufacturers of articles pertaining to the industry have made arrangements to exhibit their products, and so many firms in other branches not directly connected with the motion picture business, such as the vacuum cleaners, electric fans, souvenir novelties, etc., have taken so much space that it seems likely that there will not be space enough in the Palace to accommodate all those desirous of exhibiting."

From the hearty applause tended Mr. Tichenor upon the conclusion of his remarks, it is sure that all those present will take an active interest in the coming convention and exposition.

THE JUDGE'S VINDICATION

(Reliance 2-reel Release for April 2)

A remarkably interesting plot is worked out in the story of "The Judge's Vindication," and the capable manner in which the Reliance players have handled their respective roles renders the production well worth the seeing. After "The Bells," produced by the Reliance Company a short time ago, "The Judge's Vindication" certainly comes next in quality of dramatic action and finesse of production.

E. P. Sullivan, who starred in "The Bells," also has the lead in this splendid production, and impersonates the judge who was arrested for bribery through the deep-designing president of the Sugar Trust, and his associates. Some of the best scenes in the film are the committee meeting in the Senate chamber, the Judge's unsuccessful attempt to induce the president of the Sugar Trust to give up letters in his possession which would prove the falsity of the accusation, and the successful attempt of the Judge's daughter and the star reporter of a leading newspaper. This latter is most thrilling and is splendidly worked up.

Again we must praise the splendid work of the Reliance players in this production. Some of those whose names we are ignorant have done remarkable, notably the president of the Sugar Trust, the Senator, the lawyers for both parties, the daughter of the Judge, and even the young man, whose only bit of business is to hand a pencil to the star reporter, which part, by the way, has been cleverly interpreted by Irving Cummings, adds tone and spirit to the production by the eager interest which he displays in this one act.

LINES TO THE FAULT-FINDER

I call that man a pessimist,
  Who is ever waiting to sling
A stone of defect to totally wreck
  The good of everything.

Everything in this world has its weakness,
  No matter how strong it may seem;
There is some little wrong you can trace all along
  From the greatest of things to a dream.

'Tis easy enough to find fault with the world,
  If that's what you're looking for most;
But it's better to eat of a nourishing meat,
  Than that which is not fit to roast.

There is nothing existing that's perfect,
  For God did not make it that way;
The sweetest music affords some little discords,
  And so with the picture play.

I call that man a pessimist,
  Who is ever waiting to sling
A stone of defect to totally wreck
  The good that is in a thing.

—Edward C. McCormick.

The Selig production of "Pauline Cushman" utilized over 1,000 well-trained soldiers who were kept on the salary list for a full week.

ALICE INWARD IN "TEMPERAMENTAL ALICE"
Excelsior release April 7th.

THE SUPERIOR LAW

It is with pleasure that we make special comment on the American Eclair feature release for April 2. This film is indeed worthy of special comment. The story has evidently been based on the theme of a story well-known to all of us, and which we will leave the auditor to guess for himself when he sees the picture.

The Canadian wilds has again served as an interesting and picturesque background for a film story. The plot of the story is, we must admit, somewhat complicated, and even obtuse in spots, but even that obtuseness, strange to say, in this particular production, carries with something of allurement. The strange conception of characters also has a charm, and there is a peculiar something about the production that holds your attention fast and hard.

The writer has not commenced this short eulogy with the intention of telling the story of the film, but merely to show an appreciation of an effort in filmdom that is worth while.

EXPOSITION NEWS

Since the first of January an immense amount of work has been accomplished in furthering the interest of the First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, which is to be held in conjunction with the Third Annual Convention o fthe Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America at the New Grand Central Palace, July 7 to 12, 1913.

The floor space, which measures some 40,000 square feet, is rapidly selling, and from the present outlook it would seem that the New Grand Central Palace, large as it is, will not be large enough.

Within the last week the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, makers of the Motiograph Projection Machine, through their New York manager, Mr. Fred A. Clark, signed for spaces No. 327 and 328, and that leaves but very little space in that part devoted to projecting machines.

The Edison Company have closed for spaces No. 205, 206, 207 and 208, and a novel display will be prepared immediately.

Mr. Frank E. Samuels, secretary of the committee, is at the present time in London attending the Cinematographic show there as representative of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

There is little doubt from the correspondence already received but that Mr. Samuels will bring back several signed contracts for space with him.

Under a special act of Congress received this year by the International Exposition Company of the New Grand Central Palace, all goods for exhibition purposes may be brought into the United States free of duty. This will enable foreign manufacturers to send their exhibits to the Motion Picture Trades Exposition free from all the annoyance and expense of customs duties, and without doubt a number of our European friends will take advantage of this.

SELIG POLYSCOPE COMPANY

"A Lucky Mistake" is the title of a laughable comedy which will be released by the Selig Polyscope Company on April 2nd. The mistake in this case occurs when a careless telegraph operator makes the word "assists" read "arrest." On the same reel is an imposing Selig educational travelogue entitled "Chinese Temples."

Trained horses are ever interesting. Probably the most human of all so-called human horses is the famous "Arabia," known to vaudeville and circus audiences throughout the world. The Selig Polyscope Company recently completed an expensive series of unique pictures in which this human horse "Arabia" plays the featured roles. The first of the series will be released on April 3rd under the title of "Arabia, the Equine Detective."

"The Hoyden's Awakening" is the Selig Polyscope Company's release of April 4th. This is a comedy drama of life in a girls' college, and shows how an up-to-date American girl triumphed over those that conspired against her.

HIAWATHA

The Indians have been poetically called The Vanishing Race, but when one sees the vigorous old people, the hardy middle aged and the sturdy, happy children shown in the Hiawatha films, there seems to be more poetry than truth in the statement. Mr. Moore, the producer of Hiawatha, and who, through his work with the Indians, has become an authority on them, says: "The Indian is all right as long as he works out of doors and keeps away from fire water. All of our winter scenes were taken with the thermometer down around zero, and yet not one of the Indians caught cold. It took a long time to get the famine and funeral scenes, but they stood the exposure splendidly."

These winter scenes are wonderful. For a long time Mr. Moore despaired of getting them, as day after day went by and no snow fell. It is no small matter to hold 150 people together waiting for a snow storm that may not come, but his patience was rewarded, and with the snow fresh upon the ground the photographer got some of the finest negatives ever seen in New York. The snow is so soft and fleecy, and hangs on the dark trees like clouds. Against it the dark skins of the Indians stand out even better than in the summer scenes.

MISS KATHLYN WILLIAMS, famous actress and versatile leading woman of the Selig Polyscope Company forces, surprised her many friends last week, when she became married to Robert Allen, a well-known actor who is at present playing at the Burbank Theatre in Los Angeles. The ceremony was performed at the home of one of the wealthiest business men of Los Angeles, where Miss Williams is at present located in connection with the Pacific Coast Studio of the Selig Company. The marriage was followed by a spread at the Hotel Alexandria, to which a few selected friends were invited. Miss Williams, with her large following of admirers throughout the country, has many times been the recipient of flattering proposals, but it fell to the lot of Mr. Allen to carry off the coveted prize. Miss Williams has known Mr. Allen for several years, he having been featured with her during the production of "When We Were Twenty-one." Miss Williams has not allowed her new-found joy to interrupt her picture work in the least, and the day following the ceremony found her busily portraying the harrowing role of heroine in a new Selig animal feature which will soon be released.

MOVING pictures received hard treatment the other day at the hands of Prof. Allan Hoben, of the University of Chicago, who declared in an address that they have a bad influence on the minds of children. "The nickel show teaches the child just what educators and fathers and mothers do not want the child to know," he said. "It teaches irreverence of all sorts and sets up false standards of success. It presents false, unnatural situations and makes apparent virtues out of smartness and cunning." We confess that we have occasionally heard of Prof. Hoben, and as the University of Chicago has to get into type just so often, we suppose it was his turn for the limelight. Give these people a wee bit less ground to stand upon, please!

* * * *

Since moving pictures have become so popular nobody seems satisfied to stay at home in the evening and study the faces in the old family album with the red plush cover.

Few persons might be in perfect accord as to what is immoral and what is harmless in moving pictures. There are people who think that there are immoralities in "Mother Goose," and they have revised her according to their rights. We think it is immoral to let children run automobiles, but we cannot recall ever hearing of an accident which a child driver ever brought about. We have all heard this and that denounced as immoral, vicious, dangerous, irreverent, and yet have known those denouncing to have their own weaknesses, their own shortcomings which from one or more points of view were not strictly ethical. Unlike the Chicago University professor, Mayor Brand Whitlock, of Toledo, is diffident in the matter of regulating moving pictures. He has refused to act as a censor or to appoint one.

His position as Mayor calls for regulations of public morals which will still leave him free from wondering if he has been fussy, if he has let his mere individual opinions rule his hand, if he has not interfered in a little affair, the morality or immorality of which is open to argument, while ignoring a grosser affair. There are major sins and minor sins, and it is quite as much as any public officer can do to define the harsher offenses against society and act in keeping with justice and the cardinal virtues. We think Mayor Brand Whitlock has taken the wise course in leaving the problem of censorship in the hands of the picture exhibitors. The University of Chicago professor will differ with us there, having through one way or another acquired the conviction that moving picture men are just naturally depraved. But anyway, Mayor Whitlock will let the exhibitors regulate their own pictures, and will give that plan a good try-out. And its success will prove there are a lot of inconsistent busybodies in the world.

Edison says he will soon have his moving picure and talking machine in every home. But wouldn't a small boy do all the moving and talking necessary?

* * * *

There have been an unusual number of little oversights creeping into certain pictures lately. We saw a picture last night that had a couple being married and leaving the church in a "taxi," and the last picture showed the old man, 60 years later, dying alone and deserted. There were no taxis sixty years ago. Some directors insist on affixing a huge seal on all messages sent during the heat of battle. Imagine stopping during a battle to affix a seal on a letter sent between officers. A doctor called to see a sick child, before placing the fever thermometer under the tongue, carefully wiped it off with a seemingly dirty handkerchief. Some sanitary precaution there. Many of the flags appearing in battle scenes recently are now new and fresh compared with the travel-stained troops shown. And when it comes to Indian scenes, some of the stiff-legged Irish-Pawnees that dance the scalp-trot around a victim tied to a pole that he could carry off without half-trying, it is ridiculous. Sure, it's easy to criticise!

It might be well for some of these city and state censors who forbid the picture theatres to show crime films to first call in a psychologist for suggestions and guidance. He might have shown the guardians of morals that that which they had thought dangerous promoted good, and that which seemingly made wrongdoing commonplace, really taught the beholders the benefits derivable from the observance of law and order, of fair dealing and charity, and of kindliness to man and beast. The scheme of presenting the mastery of good over evil in this way is as old as the art of story-telling. It is the thread of the mother's tale to her child at bedtime. It is a scheme not despised in the Scriptures. How much of good it has done we can never know, we can never measure, but that this outweighs a million times the occasional wrong it does we can feel assured.

It is not our purpose to quarrel with the law. No more than it is to suggest the defiance of the law. We only point out what seems to be another instance of the law slipping a cog. The moving pictures are so new, the little theatres are multiplying so rapidly, it is no wonder that a bewildered populace feels an overpowering impulse to hasten and regulate.

City officials of Toledo Ohio, have asked for a fund to build a municipal moving picture theatre. It is planned to have the city conduct such a place of amusement at cost for the poor.

The feature film promises to be of prime importance during the coming year. We are having all kinds and all designs of features from "The Human Doughnut," in two reels, to Shakespeare in five reels. Every theatre welcomes a good feature film, but those not so good are not so cordially welcomed. Discrimination is being keenly practiced anent features. There is a dearth of good American feature films, it seems to us. We have plenty of European productions, too many perhaps, but the good feature film of American locale is few and far between. Our country is rich in historical settings and stories, and American literature is easily accessible. Let us enter more earnestly into the American historical and classical lore.

Mr. and Mrs. Norman Browers were spectators at a moving picture show at Boonton, N. J., when one of the dramas was suddenly interrupted with these scribbled words thrown on the screen: "Norman Browers wanted at home at once." A daughter had been attacked by a burglar, and the police had telephoned the theatre where the unusual burglar alarm was immediately caught by the parents. Score another for the picture machine operator.

It used to be an event in our lives when somebody introduced a new song into our town, a song expressive of something touching and appealing like "When You and I Were Young, Maggie," or "Kathleen Mavourneen," and others. Perhaps the old-time songs are a little bit old-fashioned for present-day tastes, but they used to touch a responsive chord in our souls the modern ragtime melodic movement never reaches. Along with old books and old friends, old songs should be added. They should be given to the moving picture theatre. We know one manager who refuses to permit one of the vulgar, mawkish, up-to-date songs to be sung in his theatre. He prefers the old songs. He profits thereby, for there are many who visit his theatre as much to hear the old-time melodies as to see the pictures.

The works of O. Henry are to be filmed. The style of O. Henry can never be filmed, and so we believe that O. Henry pictures will not be extraordinary. Like Stevenson, O. Henry's charm lay in his style and diction and atmosphere.

In the opinion of Brig.-General Edwards, U. S. A., the public's lack of interest in the army is due primarily to the belief in our own military invincibility. This belief, he argues, has been instilled and fostered by the school histories more than by any other agency. Happily, the moving pictures did not come in for criticism in this regard, although we fear, there would have been some foundation upon which to build. Patriotism should be carefully instilled in the youth of the land, but historical pictures should not suffer in accuracy. This criticism of school histories is somewhat justified. The text-books of a generation ago, at least, were far too highly colored. Many a school boy has emerged from a study of the War of 1812 with the impression that in that conflict we proved our overwhelming superiority as a fighting people. If he has pursued his historical reading he knows that the war was a draw. Teaching history by means of exaggeration can do no good.

HUGH D'ARCY, famous throughout the world as author of that stirring poem, "The Face on the Floor," had a birthday last week, and to show that he was still a young fellow, invited a number of his friends to a little celebration. It took place on the roof garden of the Continental Hotel, and was a joyous occasion. Hugh made every one of the guests tell their right age, and then absolutely refused to tell his own age. However, everyone agreed that the host did not look or act as old as he really was, no matter what that age might be. Speeches of the two-minute kind filled the little gaps between the rounds of "drinks and eats," while a vaudeville show was an added attraction. The affair was attended by many prominent theatrical and literary people, and was one of the most enjoyable events of the season.

GAUMONT CHRONOPHONE

At the Gaumont Palace Hippodrome in Paris a few days ago there was exhibited a speaking film running forty-five minutes. This is by far the longest talking picture ever thrown on the screen. The pictureplay was taken from a famous French farce and was witnessed by nearly eight thousand people, the extreme capacity of the house. The dialogue was distinctly heard in the furthest corners of the auditorium without appearing unduly amplified to those in the pit. The Paris daily papers gave the Gaumont talking pictures from four inches to three-quarters of a column the next morning and described the entertainment as a revolution in the cinematograph art.

CHARACTER STUDY OF IRVING CUMMINGS IN "THE WOMAN WHO KNEW"

MAE BOTTI
New Leading Lady, Reliance Film Co.

EUSTACE HALE BALL

Eustace Hale Ball, general manager and part owner of the new Historical Film Company, of 1 Madison Avenue, and 4 Gerard Street, London, has had unique experience in moving picture work. He is a graduate of Harvard University and also of Cincinnati University, and for several years in New York after his graduation held the record for Marathon fiction writing, doing 60,000 words weekly under contract with Frank Tousey, the publisher, and other syndicates. Then he wrote the Nick Carter thrillers for Street & Smith not neglecting an occasional story in the current magazines along more serious lines. Mr. Ball founded and edited the little magazine "Broadway Buzz," and became successful as a dramatic critic. From this he entered the field of Cinematography, starting with the Eclair Company, as scenario editor and special writer. He has directed for Solax, Majestic, Reliance and other film companies, specializing in the production of his own plays. He attained much public attention by his productions of mid-air thrillers with Rodman Law, the sky-trouper, and is the first cinematographic director to have managed and produced an entire film-play in the breezy, "Saved by Airship," in which Mr. Ball and his aviator, Harry Bingham Brown, did some aerial duets in a biplane which caused three camera men to lose their jobs from stage fright. He is Librarian of the Screen Club, and a member of the Harvard Friars, Southern, and other well-known clubs. The Historical Film Company will soon begin releasing for the "open market" special productions along educational and historical lines, under the auspices of the great universities and the Federal government, in new lines which it is believed will surprise the "old guarders." American historical plays, with all-star casts, will be specialized upon. English scenery and history will be utilized by the London branch of the company, for American sale. A number of Wall street capitalists are backing the new organization, as well as two men high up in filmdom finances.

"Human Interest Stuff"

"HUMAN interest stuff" is newspaper parlance for heart interest. Heart interest is that which arouses emotion and appeals to the heart, and not invariably to the head. When the editors inform you that they like "gripping heart interest" they mean they like that kind of script that "goes over with an appeal." If you want to be a good script writer you must have the knack of writing "human interest stuff." It is not the story so much as the angle you put to the story that causes human heart interest. A shabby little man died in a cheap hotel in Cleveland the other day. Not so much here. But a writer on the Cleveland Leader had the "human interest touch." Here is the lead as he wrote it:

"There was no one to rub the fevered temples of the little gray-haired man and the gray-haired man was dying. Neither was there anyone to arrange the curtains—had there been curtains—and there was no one to fix the shade so it would keep out the strong morning light which had just begun to stream through the none too clean windows.

"And so the little gray-haired man just died, without a fuss. At least, if there was a fuss, the Palisades didn't know of it, and the strong morning light continued to penetrate into the little bare room.

"In the course of time the window shade was adjusted to keep out the light, and the fever had left the temples of the little gray-haired man, and the Haymarket had lost another of its claims to fame, for the little gray-haired man was the Palisades man of mystery. Besides, there was another name to be checked off the hotel register; or, perhaps, it could be left on—the name didn't mean anything—and there would always be plenty of Joe Smiths."

Let you and I write a story with the "human interest touch." Blanche Douglass, aged 13, took care of the children after her mother died. She sacrificed her life to save one of them at a railroad crossing. Not so much here. But let us get in the human interest touch. Here is the way we develop the story of Blanche Douglass:

"Take care of my babies," whispered Blanche Douglass, aged 13, when she was carried, dying, into a hotel at Quincy, Thursday, after being struck by a locomotive.

"The babies will be cared for, never fear," replied a physician encouragingly. Strong men wept.

Satisfied, the "little mother," as she is known in Quincy, sank into unconsciousness, from which, physicians assert, she will never be aroused. They say she has sacrificed her life to save one of her babies.

Since Mrs. Elmer Douglass died, three years ago, Blanche, the eldest daughter, has tenderly cared for the motherless brood of six younger children. Every morning she has arisen, washed and dressed the younger children, prepared breakfast, and got her brother, Arthur, aged 6, ready for school. She promised her mother on her deathbed that she would look after the little ones, and she has never faltered.

Thursday afternoon Blanche and her little brother Arthur approached the Big Four street crossing at Quincy, en route to school. Blanche crossed in the face of an approaching freight train, east bound. She turned and perceived her brother, standing in the center of the track, helpless from fright. Despite warning shouted by horrified spectators the little girl rushed to save her brother. As she pushed him safely from the track she was struck by the train and hurled 20 feet. Crushed and bleeding she was carried to shelter. Knowing that she had saved him, the next thought of the little mother was for her babies and when assured that they would be cared for she became unconscious.

So it is with script writing. It is the developing of the human interest touch in your stories so they will "go over" that draws the checks from editorial departments. Have you the human interest—the dramatic touch? No? Well, you should get it to succeed.

Will Make a Good One

Ralph Stoddard, author and editor of the Cleveland Leader Moving Picture Page, has been asked for the book rights to his history of the moving pictures now running serially in the Leader. It will make an authoritative and interesting addition to any motion picture library.

Well Deserved Honor

No better selection than A. W. Thomas could have been made to head the Photoplay Clearing House recently inaugurated under the direction of the Motion Picture Story Magazine.

An Optimistic Report

A. Van Buren Powell, president of the Order of Optimists, surely lives up to his responsible position when writing about Epes W. Sargent's dinner recently served. He writes: "The dinner was a success. Add to the appetizing provender, perfectly served, the wit of writers, the intellect of editors, the sagacious sayings of directors and the sparkle and vivacity of the feminine members of the gathering, and you have a combination impossible to be bettered. Editors of note spoke words of cheer and encouragement. Producers of high standing told us how far from antagonistic are their feelings toward the scribe—Mr. Herbert Brennon of the Imp went so far as to say they could not get along without 'outside writers,' and Mr. Sargent was the presiding genius. The dinner surely reflects credit upon the sponsor."

And Mr. Powell is no more enthusiastic than the others who were fortunate enough to be there.

Thanks Miss West

A St. Louis writer thanks Miss West for a sample picture play published by the News. She says she has derived great benefit from our text-book and was enabled to sell three scripts after perusing it. The lady wants this published and we do so.

Moved to St. Louis

A correspondent "K. H." received word from Cleveland that her three months' subscriptions to a purported "Scenario Monthly" was not filled because "publication offices had been moved to St. Louis." She wrote to St. Louis and is inclined to believe the offices are still moving. Ask Uncle Sam about it.

An Address Wanted

The address of "The Photoplay Author" is Holyoke, Mass. T. E. Letendre is the editor.

A Line from Mr. Schulberg

Mr. B. P. Schulberg has helped to make The Famous Players Film Company famous. Before that he was editor for Rex and for Imp, and wrote those heart touching rejection slips that made you—well, we used to get 'em, too! The Famous Players are going to make a feature every other week, or possibly every week, a powerful two or three-reel drama, without a star, in conjunction with the bigger productions once every two months, with a star. This is going to set a new standard in feature production, and the Famous Players Company wishes scripts. The concern will pay the biggest prices on record to get the goods. The "correspondence school" scripts are not desired, and only the first-class stuff should be submitted to this concern. Here i sa good market for experienced and original writers.

Changing Titles

In answer to several readers we state that editors certainly have the right to change script titles and do change them. There are many reasons. The title may not be as original as the script, may be too long, or any one of a hundred other reasons. Try to make your titles appealing, comprehensive, and also possessing the necessary bounce. Nothing advertises a film better than a good title, and nothing detracts more from a film than a commonplace, meaningless title.

An Intimation to Melies

Will the Melies publicity man kindly send in the stories of Melies releases every week?

Here It Comes Again!

Yes, we single space each and every one of our picture scripts and double space magazine stories and special articles. We were quoted recently as double spacing scripts, but we do not. A small item in any event.

Many for MacNamara

There is a new staff man working for the Universal, and his name is Walter MacNamara. He is Irish, like ourself, and so he is to be congratulated. The point of it is, however, that MacNamara is a successful writer of legitimate drama who has turned his attention to script writing and is overturning all theories. Some of his comedies produced recently; "The Would-be," "The Collaborators," "The Double Cross," "What Katy Did," "Almost a Hero," "Ole, the Hypnotist," "One of the Bravest," "The Honeymooners," the "Binks" series, "Billy's Uncle," "A Sprig o' Shamrock," etc. Dramatic: "King Danforth Retires," "The Regeneration of John Storm," "The Rise of Officer 174."

"Not Like Other Girls"

Here is one writer of successful fiction who is "not like other girls." She wasn't condescending in her attitude toward picture play writing, was pleased to glean a few ideas as to the profession, and realized that she must work hard to succeed in another line of literary work. We refer to Maibelle H. Justice, well known magazine writer, who promises to become just as well known as a script writer. You have all read her magazine stories, the latest started in the Cosmopolitan of current issue. She writes:

> It is only within the past three months that I have sought entree, but in that time I have found the work so fascinating that my literary work has suffered sadly. The enjoyment has been my discovery that I could write scenarios. The editors have been very encouraging, and I will work harder than ever in consequence. The producers have followed my scripts identically in most cases so far, and I am really trying very hard to introduce something new in each script, so that my thirteen plays so far accepted are entirely different from each other; after I see them all on the screen I will try and see where my forte lies. These embrace dramas, Western romances, historical, and two plays are to be two-reel features. At the studios, in the editorial rooms, etc., I have met such pleasant people, that it has been an incentive to attempt really earnest and good work. And like the small child, you know, starting out on conquest, I have about a hundred ideas I am eager to work out. It is not all fun; it is real hard work if one wishes to submit good work, and I shall never attempt any other kind. The Smart Set publishes a novel of mine in a near number and very shortly my short stories begin in the Cosmopolitan Magazine. But the scenario game is so novel and new to me, that not a short story has developed for weeks, for as fast as I sit down to my typewriter to write one, it turns out a moving picture play. You know how it goes.

Here is a successful writer of fiction who, turning to a new literary game, does not think "all editors incapable" to quote a recent correspondent. Her enthusiasm is contagious, and we deem such communications helpful to others not so talented, perhaps, as Miss Justice. We hope she will write in early and often.

Pertinent Pointers

A great many underestimate the requirements for successful script writing.

Conceive your main idea and then proceed to build your plot around it.

The element of suspense is never lacking in a good picture play. Cultivate this element.

Do not write descriptive history; write short sentences. The ability to put a good sentence together is no small art.

Your stories should be seasonable. Love stories are always most popular.

Avoid the triangle. The two men and the woman or the two women and the man are rarely novelly situated.

There is a great demand for new material and it creates a wide field for the writer of talent.

Remember, genius is the capacity for hard work and for taking pains.

Nothing in It

We read an argument the other day in which it was stated that the newspaper reporter who "gets into the rut by writing of common events" has a "wearied style" that is inapplicable to script writing. This listens well, and may be applicable to the "journalists" of ten or fifteen years ago. Nine out of ten newspaper reporters have little opportunity to develop any "wearied style" of their own nowadays. The day men generally 'phone in their stuff and the night men are under the tender mercies of a copy reader. The good newspaper of to-day is the sheet that has the "punch." No one with a "wearied style" is permitted to loaf around any newspaper office of any consequence. We believe with C. B. Hoadley, that newspapermen are unusually successful in picture play writing. Many of the successful script editors and authors got their first "bumps" in the newspaper world. The same rule is applicable to fiction writers of prominence. Among many literary stars who graduated from the newspaper profession can be named: Kipling, Chester, Whitlock, the late O. Henry and David Graham Phillips, Opie Read, Augustus Thomas, the playwright; Eugene Wood, Finley Peter Dunne, Vance, W. D. Howells, the late Mark Twain, in fact nearly every topnotcher past and present, including Charles Dickens, who was first a court reporter before he became a novelist.

These men and others may have "wearied styles" but we do not think so. These men graduated from a hard school. They had to write—write when they "felt bad," write when they "felt good," write any old time or place, and in any environment. Hence they learned the value of ready thought and the tools of their trade. And another thing: Nine out of ten city editors will tell you that they would rather break in the reporter fresh from the country newspaper who has had assignments ranging from the courthouse to the First Methodist Church, than any number of "graduates" from "schools of journalism," or "highbrows" with sheepskins and secret contempt for the profession in which they wish to start.

We've Taken It Up

To the good California lady who paid $30 for a "course" and got five lessons only, we want to say that we have asked the post-office department to investigate the "professor" and his whereabouts.

"Stick to the Ship"

Nashville, Tenn., writes that although he has ability and a newspaper "job," he has failed to sell a script. He subscribed to two different "courses of lessons" and tried hard for a year. Keep on trying for another year and forget the "schools." Don't give up the ship and your ship may come in sooner than you anticipate.

"Lacks Available Environment"

A Cincinnati script writer got a rejection slip checked as above. He is in a quandary because he asserts that a scene required a pool room. The less pool rooms the better, and perhaps the concern named by the Cincinnati man has finally reached that conclusion and so checked the rejection.

SCENARIO EXPERTS

I have to caution my numerous readers against sending two, three and five dollars to so-called scenario experts, who are writers of scenarios and short of ideas. I have recently received many complaints from readers who have sent money and scenarios for criticism, and no acknowledgment has been made, nor has the script been returned. Some writers say they have seen their story produced in several films recently released—a rank steal—and a very contemptible one.

I will publish the letters giving the names of films and the directors and editors to whom the scripts have been sent in a near issue.

HIS DAY OF FREEDOM

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Reliance Release)

THE one clerk came into the one shoe store at Freeport-by-the-Sea and prepared to begin his day's work.

"There's a big box of shoes come in from the prison this morning," announced the proprietor, "I have to go out for a while. You had better empty the box as soon as you can."

Whistling as he moved about, the clerk gathered together his few necessary tools and went into the back room, where the new box was. Deftly he worked, as one used to the job. The nails were drawn and the broad boards laid aside. The clerk was about to remove the heavy paper lying just beneath the lid, when suddenly the paper rose straight up in the air and the clerk received a blow on the head that knocked him unconscious to the floor.

A man sprang from the box and stood looking round him as he stretched himself. His eyes stopped when they came upon a long coat and a hat hanging upon a nail. They were apparently just what he was looking for. Quickly covering his striped prison clothes with the coat, and pulling the hat down well over his head, he walked through the store and out onto the street.

The convict's stomach was knocking softly, but insistently against his backbone. His greatest desire was to satisfy this demand. The question was, how could he do it? He had no pockets of his own so he felt hopefully in those of the overcoat he was wearing. They were painfully empty.

The man walked leisurely along the street looking for a promising place to secure some food without money or some money with which to buy it.

Some distance down the street was situated a cottage with a store in one corner of the front. It happened to be the corner nearest the hungry man. On that side of the cottage ran a hedge about three feet from the wall and nearly as high as a man.

The hungry one thought this looked promising At least it was a good place to make one's plans undisturbed. So into the midst of the hedge he crept.

Now, in this cottage lived one Jones, fisherman by trade and keeper of a general store. With him lived his daughter Bettie. She was young, attractive and much sought after by the young men of the village. She was also a good business woman and attended to the store almost entirely beside her household duties.

On this particular day Bettie was busying herself merrily about the store and the kitchen behind it.

The man in the hedge heard tuneful melodies hovering between the store and the kitchen and smelled delicious odors issuing from the latter.

When he was about to move along the hedge a little closer to the odors, Jones came into the store.

"Bettie!" he called.

The girl came into the store.

"I've just made a good sale. Put this away."

The girl took a roll of bills from her father and he immediately left the store. She counted the money, came to a shelf beside the side window and put the roll into a tin box setting there. Then she quickly turned and ran out onto the front porch to meet young Paul Kimble, whom Bettie heard approaching. From her manner of meeting him one should be justified in believing that their relationship was something more than friendship.

The man in the hedge saw all this. He also saw that a wonderful apportunity had come to him. He realized that the money was within four feet of him and the food more nearly forty feet—and boiling upon the stove. Thinking that money in the pocket is worth more than food in somebody else's kitchen, he quickly and deftly reached through the open window and secured the tin box with its contents.

No sooner was the box in his pocket than the thought struck him: "Why shouldn't I have the money and the food, too?" Straightway he went to Bettie's kitchen and softly approached the stove.

No sooner had the lid of a tempting pot been lifted than the man heard Bettie say, "You must mind the shop, Paul, while I clean the kitchen. It needs it badly."

The man turned to escape, but he saw that he would be caught if he attempted to reach the door. The huge wood-box stood open near the stove and was almost empty. In a moment he was in it and the lid closed.

When Bettie came into the kitchen she saw at a glance that her fire needed replenishing, so she went straight to the wood-box. As she laid her hand on the lid she heard voices in the store. With her head turned in that direction she mechanically raised the heavy oak lid as high as it would go. She stood for a moment listening to the voices, now growing very angry. A blow was struck; Bettie let go the lid and ran into the store.

When Bettie left the store a short time before, Felix Hill had entered the front door. Seeing Paul behind the counter he smiled sneeringly and said, "Working for a woman, are you?"

Paul did not answer.

"She can wind you round her little finger all right."

"Well, I guess you'd like to be wound," answered Paul.

"You lie!" flashed Felix, and struck at Paul.

Then a struggle and incoherent words and then blows.

When Bettie reached the store the fight was in full swing with Paul winning. She grabbed him by the arm and dragged him from Felix. Then she pushed them both out through the doorway, saying angrily: "I am ashamed of you both."

Calming her anger as best she could, the girl returned to the kitchen to see to her neglected fire. When she raised the lid of the wood-box great was her astonishment upon seeing the convict, just recovering from the dazed condition he had been put into when Bettie dropped the heavy lid upon his head.

If Bettie had not been so angry with the two men she had just ejected from the store she probably would have been frightened by this other man, but as it was she was only startled.

"What are you doing there? Who are you?" she exclaimed.

The man began to climb from the box. Bettie saw that he seemed unsteady and assisted him. In doing so she pulled aside his coat and revealed the striped clothes of the prison.

"You're an escaped convict!" cried the girl.

"Yes, I am, lady," he acknowledged, "and I'm awful hungry. You ought to give me some food for nearly killin' me just now."

Then he told Bettie how he had stuck his head up out of the box when she lifted the lid, hoping that he would frighten her so she would run away and he could escape; how she had dropped the lid suddenly on top of his head and stunned him.

Betty felt very sorry that she had hurt the man and straightway gave him some fish and potatoes.

When he had nearly finished he suddenly stopped, "What's that?" he asked in a half whisper.

Bettie looked out

"It's a big crowd," she answered, "they are coming this way."

"Oh, hide me, please hide me!" pleaded the man. And Bettie, not bothering about the right or wrong of it, only following her impulse, put him in a dark closet hidden from view.

"We're lookin' for a convict, Miss Bettie. You ain't seen one around, I reckon," said the leader of the mob.

"I haven't been outside this morning," answered Bettie calmly. "I've just been from the kitchen to the store. You can take a look round if you want to"

The men went around to the back of the house and looked through the outhouses, then they went on their way.

Bettie ran quickly to the closet door and opened it. "Put on that old suit hanging there," she commanded. "and then go as fast as you can."

When the man had gone Bettie vigorously attacked the kitchen. Things were happening so fast that her mind was in a whirl.

"Bettie!"

The girl went to answer her father's call.

What do you mean." he demanded, "by leaving a fellow to care for this store who has no more decency than to fight here?"

"Father, I don't think it was altogether his fault, I think——"

"No matter what you think, girl, I guess I know about how it was."

As he spoke he went to the little shelf by the window. "Where's the tin box," he asked.

"Why—why—isn't it there?" asked Bettie helplessly.

"No!" thundered the father.

Felix, who had come in behind Jones, looked from him to Bettie quickly. Then he said: "I saw Paul put a tin box in his pocket."

Jones whirled upon Bettie. "So that's the kind of customer he is, is it. We'll get him, all right."

Before Bettie could find her voice to speak in Paul's defence her father and Felix were gone. For several minutes she stood trying to see the best thing to do, but feeling helpless to prove Paul's innocence. She knew in her heart that he was not guilty of such a thing, and yet she could not prove it. At least she must let him know that she believed him innocent.

Away she flew over the ground as fast as she could go.

There was a crowd around the constable's office when Bettie arrived and the constable was just leading Paul away.

"Oh!" she cried, and then gazed after them in dumb despair.

"Hold on!" cried a man in the crowd. Everybody turned and the constable and his prisoner stopped.

"Who dares to tell me to hold on?" asked the officer.

"I do, and I'll tell you why," continued the man. "Let that fellow go. Here's the old man's tin box. I took it myself before that fellow come into the store. You all wonder who I am, do you? Well these'll tell you."

He pulled off his coat and revealed his stripes.

"The convict!"

"Yes, but you needn't get so excited. I could 'ave run away if I'd wanted to. It's not my conscience but that little girl that's troublin' me. She was good to me and I couldn't bear to see her look like she did just now. And you, you good-for-nothin', lyin' sneak," he said turning to Felix. "I may be a hardened criminal, but I'm not as bad as you."

Felix turned and left the crowd with his head hanging.

"I suppose you're tickled to get me again," the man went on, "but there's one thing you can't do. You can't take away my one day of freedom no matter what you do with me."

OPENING OF LOEW'S BROADWAY

The opening of Loew's Broadway Theatre this week with motion pictures, proved most successful. First run Association pictures are being exhibited there, with an orchestral accompaniment of music arranged and directed by Ernst Luz, of the Moving Picture News.

Although the Loew theatres are playing an important part in the picture game throughout the country, it is interesting to note as a landmark in the history of the motion picture, that a New York theatre of the significance of the Broadway should lend itself even temporarily to the exhibition of motion pictures.

The summer season will, no doubt, find large and intelligent crowds of people regaling themselves in the comforting silence (save for the sweet strains of the orchestra, to be sure) and interesting entertainment of Loew's Broadway.

A moving picture man in Chicago estimates that the American people spend $500,000 a day on moving picture shows, and that 5,000,000 persons a day go to see them, and each person stays an hour on the average.

THE EYE OF A GOD

(Warner's Features. Three reels)

The film in question is one round of interesting action from start to finish. It might be classed as a refined melodrama, for ti is thrilling without being blood-curdling, and intensely interesting and refined in action and interpretation.

This film was produced by the Pyramid Film Company, the interiors of which have been staged at the Crystal studio. Miss Mabel Weeks has made an exceedingly clever effort which is apparently effortless in the characterization of Eleanor Brockway, the leading female role of the play.

The story of the film is as follows: William Brockway, a highly respected merchant, is discovered to be an expert forger, and is at last caught red-handed and sentenced to a term in prison, where he dies before his sentence term is ended. Meantime, while he is still alive, his daughter falls in love with and marries a young man by the name of Frank Hammond. The sorrow and mortification of Eleanor at learning that her father is a criminal causes her to conceal the fact from her husband. The time comes, however, as it surely must in any case of the kind, when not alone did the truth burst forth, but the reputation and happiness of Eleanor came near to ruin through the misunderstanding and wrong impressions which deceit resulted in.

A cellmate of her father's, escaping from prison in the coffin prepared for the body of her father, preys upon her for money, threatening to disclose to her husband the awful truth which she has striven to conceal, until one day he, by his threats, forces her to take from its place in the safe a beautiful necklace given her by her husband, and which contained a wonderful brown diamond taken from the forehead of an image of Buddha, and give it to him. He escapes with the necklace. A detective who is employed on the case, finds the finger prints of Eleanor on the jewel box Mary Lane, the maid of Eleanor, and whom Eleanor and her father have rescued from a suicidal death, in her love and gratitude, and to save her mistress from disgrace, gives herself up as the thief. In the meantime, however, the detective, which role has been cleverly played by Chester Barnett, finds the real thief in a rathskeller trying to sell the necklace A thrilling chase ensues, resulting in the capture of the thief and incidentally the betrothal of Detective Byrnes and Mary.

Some tremendously thrilling scenes occur in the course of the three reels of the filmed story, including a realistic dash over a cliff, and an automobile wreck.

THE ENTERPRISE OPTICAL MANUFACTURING COMPANY

We are introducing herewith a cut of the latest product of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, the 1913 Model Motor Driven Chicago Approved Motiograph machine which, while in general appearance is similar to the Motiograph of previous years, takes a great step forward in improvements, and is one of the most compact, durable and attractive-looking machines now on the market.

The Motiograph Company has also had approved for use a fully enclosed type of rewind (as illustrated) mounted on metal-covered board, with self-closing magazine doors and high-speed release gear crank handle.

We are advised that, in line with the usual wideawake policy of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, they are instituting a service department, a move considered by many very radical, yet one sure to bring the results looked for, which has been tried and proven in the automobile industry, with the typewriter makers, sewing machine companies and others who cater to a widely scattered and miscellaneous class of users.

This service department, which the makers of the Motiograph propose to install is, in a few words, the putting out of a force of competent inspectors and demonstrators, who will combine the work of demonstrating the latest model Motiograph motor driven machine, with the inspection of all models of the Motiograph machine now in use. We mean by this, inspecting in the booth of the owner of a machine, and as soon as a force of competent men are secured, trained in the factory and equipped for the road, you may expect a visit at almost any time from one of the Motiograph representatives, each of whom will bear a letter of introduction, and will, in every instance, use his best endeavors to adjust the Motiograph machines free of any cost to the owner.

It might be well to mention, at this time, that the following young men—demonstrating salesmen—are attached to the force of the Motiograph Company:

Mr. Fred A. Clark, of Boston, who has been with the company for the past two or three years, and is now in charge of the New York office, as Eastern manager. Mr. Bernard M. Corbett, also from Boston, a member of the Elks and formerly a demonstrating salesman with the Thomas A. Edison Company, Inc. Mr. Lewis E. Neukom, for many years one of the most competent operators in Chicago, and who has been in the employ of the Motiograph Company as Chicago inspector for the past three years. Mr. John A. Kloman, another Chicago man, who has had many years of experience, in some of the best theatres in Chicago, and who has been attached to the staff of the Motiograph Company's inspectors for a year or more. Mr. John McAuley, another Chicago boy, who is an expert mechanic, and has had many years of experience in the operating room, and who has been in the service of the Motiograph Company for several months, and who is now attached to the Eastern office. Mr. Sidney B. Blakely, another Chicago boy, who recently left his position as chief operator of the Kedzie Amusement Company to become a traveling inspector and demonstrator for the Motiograph Company, and who in the year 1910 was employed by the European agents of the Nicholas Power Company to look after the demonstration in England of the Powers Cameragraph. Mr. William D. Burroughs, a New York operator of several years' experience, and from a point of age, the dean of the Motiograph men, who is now attached to the Pacific Coast office of the Motiograph Company, and who has been doing some excellent work along the Pacific slope.

The manager of the Motiograph Company, Mr. L. A. Woodward, is very enthusiastic over this new service department, and says that with a tryout of six months in Chicago, there were over 100 theatres called upon and adjustments made in the booth, that he is well satisfied with the results obtained so far, and hopes within the near future to have from 12 to 25 men constantly on the move, making all towns where there is more than one theatre.

Mr. Woodward himself has some reputation as a traveler, and in the year just past, called personally on about 97 per cent of the film exchange managers and supply houses throughout the United States.

In the absence of the manager, on his many short and fast trips, the business of the company is looked after by his assistant, Mr. W. F. Herzberg, an electrical engineer of wide experience, who for seven years was connected with the Illinois Tunnel Company.

The president of the company, Mr. A. C. Roebuck, while not able to devote a great deal of his attention to the business, spends a considerable portion of his time at the factory, is very enthusiastic over the success of the 1913 model and is laying plans for further improvements. His success in the introduction of useful improvements on motion picture machines is already so well-known that it is not necessary, at this time, to further dwell on what you may expect from this wideawake company.

JUST GOSSIP

By The Mahoney

Mahoney Herb Brenon is unquestionably a great general. He never orders his men anywhere, or to take any chances, he is not willing to assume.

In a recent Imp production it became necessary for an actor to leap from the deck of a liner into the bay.

The man selected for the part balked at the crucial moment, and all arguments, reasoning and inducements proved futile until Herb's patience exhausted, he exclaimed with that spirit of polite aggressiveness for which he is noted:

"Ah! get out of those togs and give 'em to me! I'll do it myself."

And he did. Brave boy, Herby.

Mahoney Schenck, until recently associated with the World's Best Film Company, now located at Tampa, Fla., tells an interesting story of the recent thrilling experience of Capt. Jack Bonavita, who is making an effort to inject some throbs into the Universal output.

There was a situation in the Wizard of the Jungle, where Bonavita, portraying the part of a spiritless, nerve-racked man, is seized by an enraged lion and carried away in its mouth.

Brutus, a forest-bred animal, the one selected, had always been tractable and under the captain's complete subjection in the arena, but the change from the dauntless trainer to the fear-stricken character he was portraying, evidently confused the brute, for he came through the improvised jungle (a dense tangle of weeds and underbrush) with glaring eyes and wide-open mouth, snorting and growling.

The Captain, with an assumption of fear, retreated, still issuing his commands, which the magnificent brute failed to comprehend, for with a bound he landed fairly on top of the fearless Captain and bore him to the ground.

His jaws locked; and when driven off through the combined efforts of the assistants, armed with revolvers and ammonia-saturated sponges, a large area of the leather suit worn by the Captain under his costume, and considerable flesh from his side was missing.

"A month at least in the hospital for yours," said the doctors, but Jack's back on the job again.

A well-known Mahoney started out last week in quest of P. A. Powers. Rumor reported him at the Hotel Marie Antoinette, to which place the "Mahone" went in search of him, but met with disappointment.

Next his steps were directed to the Mecca building, where they denied all knowledge of any such "person."

"Exchange Alley" was next explored, still no trace of the "Peck's Bad Boy" of Cinematography.

Several other haunts of the redoubtable P. A. were visited, but without success, until 133 West Forty-third street was named as the one best bet, and thither the well-known "Mahone" directed his steps.

As he entered the building he encountered the general manager of—(the elevator).

"Is Mr. P. A. Powers located in this building?" he inquired.

"No, sah," answered the descendant of Ham.

"Why, I understood, from extensive advertisements, that he had a suite here."

"Must be some mistake, sah."

The well-known "Mahone" thanked the G. M. of the E., moved toward the door, when his egress was interrupted.

"Wait a minit, boss! Who did you say?"

"Why, P. A. Powers, the moving picture magnate!"

"Oh, yes! Yes! Now I understan'; dey is a man comin' in by de name of "Pat" Powers; guess mebbe dat's him!"

And the "Mahone" departed, wondering if dignity really means anything.

Mahoney Lee Beggs is talked of as one of the budding additions to the ranks of the manufacturing magnates.

Inspired by the enormous sales enjoyed by his productions while with the Solax and Imp Companies, and the glowing prospects of an open market, Lee signifies a willingness to part with some of the accumulated bankroll, which he proudly exhibits from inside his vest pocket, to the envious and longing gaze of the Mahoneys who gather in Exchange Alley.

"You've played in 'Crockett,' Lee, remember Davy's sage advice and counsel:

"'Be sure you're right! Then go ahead!'"

Mahoney Charley De Forrest has some screamingly funny ideas for comedy subjects, but is most unwise in these times of "pilferers" and "pilferings" to exploit them so boldly.

If the stories "screen" as funny as they "tell," they'll be a howl, but—unfortunately a "theme" of any description in the motion picture game is never really "told" until it is "screened."

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

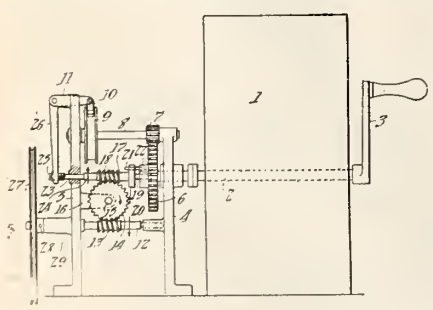
In view of the unreasonable criticism of, and attempts to tamper with, our Patent Laws, which are the best and most liberal in the world, we desire to call attention to what Daniel Webster had to say about them as long ago as 1852.

"The Constitution does not attempt to give an inventor a right to his inventions, or to an author a right to his literary productions. No such thing. But the Constitution recognizes an original, pre-existing, inherent right of property in the invention, and authorizes Congress to secure to inventors the enjoyment of that right. But the right existed before the Constitution and above the Constitution, and is, as a natural right, more clear than that which a man can assert in almost any other kind of property. What a man earns by thought, study and care, is as much his own as what he obtains by his hands. Invention, as a right of property, stands higher than inheritance or devise, because it is personal earning. It is more like acquisitions by the original right of nature. In all these there is an effort of mind as well as muscular strength. Upon acknowledged principles, rights acquired by invention stand on plainer principles of natural law than most other rights of property.

"The right of an inventor to his invention is no monopoly. A monopoly, as it was understood in the ancient law, was a grant of the right to buy, sell, or carry on some particular trade, conferred on one of the king's subjects to the exclusion of all the rest. Such a monopoly is unjust. But a man's right to his own invention is a very different matter. It is no more a monopoly for him to possess that than to possess his own homestead."

An issue of 794 patents for the week ending the 18th inst. is an indication of general prosperity. Of these 708 were issued to residents of the United States, New York leading with 107. Germany leads the foreigners with 35 to her credit. One hundred and four trade-marks, etc., were registered in the same period.

The object of Patent No. 1,054,203, issued to Daniel Higman, of New York City, is to provide means by which a phonographic and moving picture apparatus can readily be operated in synchronism, each apparatus being driven by its own independent operating means. The phonograph is operated at an approximately constant speed, while the moving picture apparatus is regulated into synchronism with the phonograph by automatic means which break or retard the movement of the moving picture apparatus when the latter exceeds the speed proper for the production of pictures in combination with the reproduction of their appropriate sounds, the force of the retarding means being removed or decreased when the speed of the moving picture apparatus is less than that at which the same should properly be run in connection with the phonographic apparatus to allow the motive means of the moving picture apparatus to increase the speed of the same and bring it into synchronism with the phonograph.



The accompanying illustration represents a front elevation of the synchronizing means shown in connection with a hand-operated moving picture apparatus 1, operated by a crank 3. An extension of the shaft is supported in frame members 4 and 5, and carries a spur gear 6 which meshes with pinion 7 on shaft 8, which also carries friction brake wheel 9, adapted to co-act with which is break shoe 10 pivotally supported from bell crank 11. Also mounted between uprights 4 and 5 is worm shaft 12 carrying worm 13 which is in mesh with worm wheel 14 mounted to rotate at 15 on arm 16 of frame member 5. Worm shaft 17 carrying worm 18 is mounted parallel to shaft 12. Work shaft 12 is rigidly mounted between uprights 4 and 5, whereas worm shaft 17 is so mounted as to allow a certain amount of longitudinal movement. Worm shaft 17 carries a reduced portion 19 at one end thereof, which has a sliding bearing in the end of the crank shaft 2. On worm shaft 17 adjacent this reduced portion 19 is a collar 20 which carries a pin 21 which is inserted in a hole in boss 22 on gear 6, connection thus being furnished through boss 22 and pin 21 whereby worm shaft 17 may be driven from crank shaft 2, while at the same time, worm shaft 17 may slide axially, pin 21 being free to move backward and forward in its hole in boss 22. Worm shaft 17 is also provided with a reduced portion 23 which has sliding bearing in upright 5 through which upright it may slide a distance determined by shoulder 24 on shaft 17 on the inner side of upright 5. Screw 25 is adjusted in a threaded opening in the end of arm 26 of bell crank 11, which is so mounted that the end of screw 25 abuts against the end of shaft 17. Connection is thus provided by which the longitudinal movement of worm shaft 17 in one direction applies brake 10 to wheel 9 and in the other direction, allows the same to release Belt wheel 27 is mounted on the end of worm shaft 12 and held by set screw 28, arm 29 of upright 5 serving as support for the overhanging end of shaft 12 and the belt wheel 27. A driving belt runs over wheel 27 and drives the same from a similar wheel on the rotating shaft of the phonograph.

When the phonographic and moving picture apparatus rotate in perfect synchronism worm 14 will turn ldiy. If the speed of shaft 2 is increased, worm 17 will rotate more rapidly than wheel 14, with the result that the brake 10 is applied, retarding the rotation of the crank shaft 2. If the speed of rotation of the picture apparatus is less than that of the phonograph the resistance of the brake is removed or lessened, whereupon the shaft 2 speeds up.

VIDENTLY a pretty small controversy. Shorter vs. Lesser, 98 Miss. 709.

The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, in re. Western Electric Company, held that the word "Inter-phone" was properly refused registration as a trade-mark for telephone switching apparatus, since it is descriptive of the character of the goods upon which it is used, and therefore comes within the prohibition of the Trade-Mark Act.

A camera that may be aimed at an object in much the same fashion that one aims a pistol or rifle is the ambition of John N. Johnson as set forth in his Patent No. 1,053,400. The inventor hails from Albuquerque, New Mexico, where quick aim is a desideratum if not a necessity.

Of the accompanying views, Figure 1 is a side elevation, and Figure 2, a front elevation of the camera 1. 2 indicates the shutter-actuating mechanism, connected by tube 3 with bulb 4 in casing 5, forming part of the camera support 6, comprising a crossbar 7 provided with sights 8 and 9. The camera is suspended by a goose-neck bracket 12 on a stud 11 seated in tube 10. A-A represents the axis of the camera. The bulb casing 5 constitutes a handle. When the sights 8 and 9, and the object are in alignment the camera axis will normally pass through the object immediately below the line of sight, so that by merely sighting at an object it is made the centre, substantially, of the picture to be taken. This obviates the necessity for the ordinary finder. The same hand which sustains the camera, and sights it, may be used to snap the picture. Even though the handle 5 be held other than perpendicular, as shown in dotted lines in Figure 2, the camera will, under the influence of gravity, swing plumb, thus invariably bringing the sides of the picture which are parallel to the top and bottom of the camera, truly horizontal. For carrying, the sight bar 7 may be used as a handle.

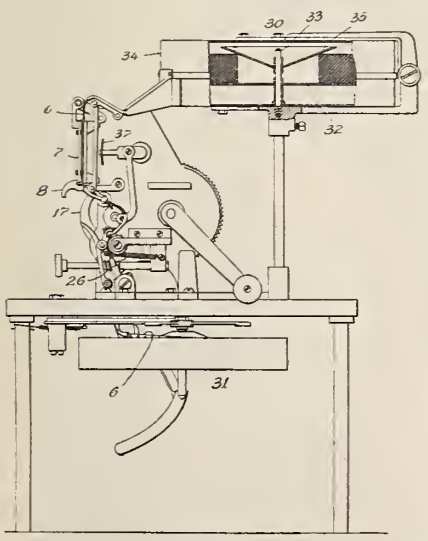
(Ad in the Leavenworth Times.)

"Very latest pictures Every convenience for ladies and children Perfect ventilation. We have taken our singer off by general request of the public."

Evidently the people of Leavenworth have the courage of their convictions—and at least one manager knows which side his bread is buttered on.

In the type of motion picture apparatus wherein the film is intermittently advanced by rolls which are given a reciprocatory motion, the requisite speed results in momentum which causes the sudden reversals of motion to "pound," making an objectionable amount of noise, wear, etc. George W. Bingham, of Brooklyn, N. Y., in Patent 1,052,209, seeks to remedy this by advancing the film by means of a tubular member which is given an oscillatory movement so as to intermittently advance the film past the point of exposure — said tubular being pivotally supported and actuated by a cam or similar mechanical expedient. Upper and lower guides may be used, oscillating in unison with said tubular exposure member; and a take-up device, such as a sprocket, may be used to take up the film as it is advanced.



The accompanying cut shows a side elevation of the machine, 6 indicating the film, and 7 the exposure tube. 8 is a latch to the door of the tube. 17 is the cam. 30 is the film-supporting means embodying the disc 32 counted on spindle 33 within the casing 34, 35 being a film-centralizing device. 37 is an oscillatory shutter. There are several sheets of drawings in the patent, the specification of which is minute in detail, and involves some 28 claims to the specific structure, which is adapted for use either as a projector or as a "taker." 31 is the film receiver.

A decision of special interest at the present time, in view of recent prior decisions and the pending of the Oldfield bill in Congress aiming to "denaturize" the patent law and practice, is that of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered January 20, 1913, in the "Creamery Package" case, in which Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court, to the effect that "the owner of a patent has exclusive rights, rights of making, using and selling. He may keep them or transfer them to another, keep some of them and transfer others. This is elementary; and keeping it in mind there is no trouble in estimating the character of such rights or their transfer. Of course, patents and patent rights cannot be made a cover for a violation of the law. But patents are not so used when the rights conferred upon them by law are only exercised. Patents would be of little value if infringers of them could not be notified of the consequences of infringement or proceeded against in the courts." The evidence in this case was held to be insufficient to establish a combination or conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade or commerce between two dependents, each of whom had brought a suit against plaintiff for infringement of a different patent

KINEMACOLOR AT THE TRAVEL SHOW

The Kinemacolor Company, in connection with the Travel Show at Grand Central Palace, is showing a series of travel scenes through the United States and Canada. The Kinemacolor pictures are a special feature, as the Kinemacolor process reproduces the scenery in more realistic colors than the artist who had painted the scenic pictures at the Travel Show could possibly produce. The authorities of the Travel Show recognized this fact and requested the Kinemacolor Company to give four performances each day, 11 to 12, 2 to 2:30, 7 to 7:30 and 10:30 to 11:00.

The progress will all be varied and there will be no repetitions throughout the entire week. The Kinemacolor Company has so many travel scenes in the United States and Canada, that they have enough to produce four complete shows every day for seven days, with many more to spare.

On Thursday, the opening day, the Travel Show was open only to invited guests, and on that day Kinemacolor pictures were shown from five to six as a special feature, Prof. A. Bert Samuels introducing the subjects.

A show space 108 feet long and 30 feet wide was set aside for the Kinemacolor pictures, and has been given by the authorities of the Travel Show for this purpose.

The various programs will include such scenic features as Niagara Falls, Glacier National Park, Yellowstone Park, Grand Canyon, Indians of the Blackfoot Reservation, Crow Indians, Scenes in California and Florida, Canadian scenes, etc.

A PLEA FOR A BETTER UNDERSTANDING

By "YORICK"

For some time past film manufacturers, together with their writers and directors, have been floundering around in a maze of contradictory suppositions as to what they are trying to do without any definite knowledge as to just "what the public wants." That old phrase has become a positive bugbear in the motion picture business as it has always been in the theatrical business. Time upon time, however, it has been proven a falsity. The motion picture audiences are made up of a more cosmopolitan class than are those of any other line of amusement, and it is a certainty that they do not all demand the same thing. Sooner or later it simmers down to what, at the moment, sells the best and then manufacturers get into a groove—forgetting that a public satiated with a cramped variety of material will soon want a change.

The censor boards throughout the country have made the situation still more difficult. That they have accomplished a great deal of good must be acknowledged, but their duty should be more to assist than retard the manufacturer. The opinions of a censor board are necessarily as varied as those of the public, and I am afraid that in too many cases pictures have been censored by opinion and not by impersonal judgment. Because I do not like a certain class of pictures or the portrayal of certain phases of life is no reason why John Henry should be denied them if he likes what I do not. Nor should I set up my opinions or tastes in defiance of his.

The day of the slapstick, the immoral, the crude and the exaggerated sensational in pictures has passed and the manufacturer who would still attempt that sort of balderdash will very soon find his level—and a mighty disastrous level, financially, it will be.

I do not doubt that the censor board, as well as manufacturers, get many letters demanding that they condemn certain kinds of pictures that other people, just as emphatically, commend. You cannot please everyone, and when you let yourself be ruled by such letters, your pictures are going to become tame and inane.

I am not deriding the efforts of the censor board, nor have I reference to the pictures of the fly-by-night producer who panders to notorious sensationalism. The latter is an evil to be earnestly decried, and should not be tolerated by the police of any city where such an exhibition occurs.

The day has come when a certain amount of enlightenment should be awakening the manufacturers to the fact that they, themselves, must study out the solution of the future of the motion picture. They must ground their ideas upon the facts before them and not be tossed about by every censorial wind that blows.

We are altogether too liable to swing to extremes, and at present we are at an extreme where almost everything is a rehash of old situations, tepid themes and overdone characters. They have become monotonous, as untertaining as they are uninteresting, and seem to suffer from a general dry rot, with so much retelling.

A protest must be lodged against the conditions that compel the artificiality of the greater part of what we see now on the screen. We do not get to the vital heart of our dramas because we are bound by these steel hoops of conservatism, and human life, with all its wonderful twistings and turnings, becomes a cramped, inanimate thing before our eyes, shorn of all possibility of earnest and true visualization. A determined and honestly square stand should be taken against these holy conventions that our efforts are being judged by and allow of a more sensible latitude.

Why should we always have to have the happy ending—let some do it, yes, but for a healthy progress in picture drama let us not all do it. Virtue need not necessarily triumph over vice, for we know that in many cases it does not. The greatest characters are not by any means the "goody goody" ones, nor are all the big themes colorless. Must we be overnice in the portrayal of a character or a situation and thereby eliminate the dramatic possibilities or of its "getting over"? If the story is worth telling, why not tell it as the body and spirit of the plot demand?

Don't, please, misunderstand me. Countenancing the vices to the other extreme is as bad, and worse, than our present situation, but there most certainly is a healthy intermediate state into which we can inject our picture plot.

Let's get away from the false to the real and deal honestly with our characters and themes. We should not assume that the spectator always wants his point of view reaffirmed. Might he not want to get the other fellow's viewpoint as well?

We should not be afraid to offend the narrow and fastidious-minded spectator either, for he can only appreciate the hackneyed, the trivial and the bloodless. By such an edict we stultify the talent of our writers and directors and fail to correctly represent or delineate the phases of character and life that are about us. There is enough insincerity in the lives of all of us, to go on countenancing the sham by holding up to nature a mirror convexed and distorted.

The rigidities of this perverted condition have driven our writers back upon themselves and have caused them to dissemble and controvert in giving expression to their ideas.

When a strong, vital theme rises up before us let us not throttle and strangle it in an attempt to make a saccharine tablet of a saline solution, but make the best of the opportunity afforded us. To convert the tame and inane themes allowed us into serviceable pictures we must exaggerate and warp them until we have made mud of our idol. This condition, mind you, prevails only in the matter of original material. Produce a subject already in print, verse or poetry, and you may depict what you like, but originality in the scenario governing similar conditions will be quickly censored.

There are one or two companies that are making a strong effort to get out of this rut and much praise is due them. One director especially is very daringly proving the argument in favor of the new era in pictures, and his psychological studies are making history in the business.

The initiative has been taken, and what one can do, others may at least strive for. So, let us all, from the manufacturer down to the humblest writer and producer, make a fresh endeavor to create a more healthy interest in our work by getting away from this quiescent, stagnant condition that is getting to be almost tradition.

BINKS, THE TERRIBLE TURK (April 5).—Zslamsco, a Turk, champion wrestler of the world, is touring America, giving exhibitions and meeting all comers. Playing a rural town, the Terrible Turk is seized with a violent toothache and the doctor, who is summoned, states that he will be unable to appear that night, and he informs Binks, his trainer, of this fact. Binks rusbes off to the theatre to inform the manager, who is taking tickets at the door. The manager is talking to three rubes who have been attracted by the billboards, which state that Zslamsco will throw three men in ten minutes or forfeit $100. The rubes, being assured that the offer is bona fide, purchase tickets and pass into the theatre. The manager, learning of the Turk's illness, rushes off to the hotel with Binks at his heels. Upon arriving in the Turk's room he proceeds to upbraid him for his cowardice, also telling him that the house is sold out. The Turk, crying, tells him that he cannot appear owing to bis great pain. The manager, in a rage, attempts to drag him out, when he is stopped by Binks. Though only a trainer, Binks has been befriended by the Turk and he won't see him abused, as be informs tbe manager.

A sudden light dawns upon the manager. Why not put Binks on in the Turk's place. He drags Binks out of the botel and down to the theatre. He tells Binks he wants him to take the Turk's place. Binks, in great fear, refuses. The manager insists and tells Binks his plan. He gets the rube stage carpenter, who is the world's champion sleeper, to bore a hole in tbe stage, the idea being for Binks to get his opponent down over the hole and the carpenter, who is to be stationed underneath the stage, is to prod the rube aspirant for the $100 with a hat pin, after which Binks will be able to defeat him easily. Binks is delighted with the plan and, after getting made up as the Turk, is introduced to the delighted audience which packs the auditorium. The manager, after introducing Binks, issues the defi on behalf of the Terrible Turk, whicb is taken up by one of the three rubes, who clambers upon the stage amid the jeers of the audience. He is soon thrown to the floor and the carpenter, hearing him fall, prods him with a pin and Binks easily puts his shoulder to the mat. Binks, elated at his success, is ready for the next husky son of the soil, whom he puts down quickly with his manager's clever assistance in tripping him. The pin doing effective work, the next victim's shoulders go down and he rushes over the footlights screaming with pain.

Binks swells up like a pouter pigeon and he glares at bis third victim, who has come to "do or die." Binks and the rube wrestle all over the stage, the rube showing great strength. Binks gets him over the hole several times, but the rube manages to get out of danger. The manager stamps on the floor to attract the carpenter's attention and, seeing his $100 leaving him, he rushes to the cellar, where he finds the custodian of tbe pin sound asleep. He awakens him and the carpenter, hearing a fall, proceeds to prod viciously, but the rube had turned the tables and had got Binks over the hole, and when he received the pin prods he immediately allowed himself to be put down and out. At this moment the manager, not knowing that his plans had failed, rushed out on the stage, only to be greeted by demands from the rube and the audience for the reward. He reluctantly paid over the money and glared at Binks, who stood rubbing his sore spots. The audience proceeded to show what they thought of the great wrestler by showering him with what they had brought for any aspirant that failed to live un to their ideas of gameness, eggs (strictly NOT fresh), cabbage, spinach, onions, etc. It was a sorry wrestling crowd that left that town.

THE BACHELOR'S HOUSEKEEPER (April 2.)—Three young bachelors, dissatisfied with club life, decide to take an apartment and keep house. They find a suitable place, and, after a few days' trial alone, they find the services of an experienced housekeeper absolutely necessary. They insert an advertisement in a daily paper. It is answered by Ethel Jennings, a young, attractive girl of twenty-two, whose family fortunes are on the decline. Against the opposition of her family, she applies in person for the position. The three young men are immediately attracted to her and engage her at a much larger salary than tbe position is worth. She begins her duties at once and finds herself surrounded by three ardent admirers. They even complicate her duties by insisting on helping her, showering her with gifts, and vie with one another for first place in her affections. They neglect their business, come home at odd bours, and forget everything in their mad race for the heart and hand of the attractive little housekeeper. At the end of one short month each one determines to learn his fate. In turn each proposes to her and two are shocked and disconsolate over her acceptance of the young lawyer, Harry. With his arms about her waist he takes her out of the apartment and to her home, to await the wedding day. The two remaining bachelors, disappointed and thoroughly unhappy over the outcome, prepare a second "Want Ad" for the paper which reads: "Wanted—A Housekeeper, must be short, fat and over 65. Address 127, this office."

THE OGRES (April 4).—John Evans, millionaire, has grown embittered through years of loneliness, and in spite of an honest desire to make friends, is feared and avoided by all. He decides to prove that he is not an ogre and goes out to do something good. He sees a small boy of the streets gazing longingly at a toy window where a mechanical railroad system is on display. He purchases the toy and offers it to the lad, who, failing to understand what it is and frightened by the man's unintentionally gruff manner, refuses to take the package and runs away. Evans decides there is nothing in charity, goes home, sends the servants away and even cuts his telephone wires so as not to be disturbed while he sulks.

Bill Stephans, released from prison, tries to live respectably, but is discouraged by the fact that everyone seems to fear him. He buys candy for a crying child, but she is jerked from his arms by her frightened mother, who refuses to allow her to eat the candy. Despondent, Bill returns to bis old life and breaks into Evans' mansion.

Bill is shot by Evans, whose sympathies are aroused by the burglar's suffering. In trying to make Bill more comfortable, Evans finds the candy on his person and Bill tells the story of his last effort at goodness. Evans understands and relates his experiences, showing Bill the railroad he bought for the boy. The men recognize a kindred spirit, become fast friends, fit the railroad together, pass the candy and smile.

Infuriated at the request, the young physician nevertheless prescribes for the dog.

Several days later the beautiful debutante solicits from the young doctor a contribution for a "Dog Hospital." Unable to refuse tbe young girl, the doctor returns his "fee."

Recognizing the bill, and thus discovering the doctor's poverty, the girl, using hypnotic influence, convinces her father that he is ill and immediately sends him to the young physician. Friends agree with the young girl that they are ill, and take her advice to consult the new doctor.

Assured that her protege is on the road to success, the young woman falls ill from overexertion.

The old family physician fails to relieve his young patient, who insists that her father call in the younger doctor.

Early in the story Cupid has wisely aimed his bow and arrow.

THE AMATEUR PHOTO PLAYWRIGHT.—A satirical comedy, novel in story and treatment. Biggs is a clerk; his wages are small, his wife has a queer cheap servant and is tired to death with her various household duties. Biggs reads of a wonderful book, cost $2.00. This book teaches anyone how to write a photo play and make money easily. The wife grudges the $2.00, but Biggs sends off the money for the book.

At his desk Biggs neglects his work, he is thinking up a grand idea for a picture play. His boss is furious, his fellow clerks amused.

The book arrives. Biggs studies it and writes and writes. He compels his wife and the cook to act out scenes for him, then he dashes off reams of writing. The play is finally finished and sent to the scenario editor of a great picture company. Biggs falls asleep and dreams his story brought $100 and an offer a position of $300 a week on the editorial staff of the picture company. He falls out of the chair and wakes with a start.

What really happened: In her office the scenario editor and her stenographer are working like mad, the postman enters with the morning mail and, horror-stricken, they examine Biggs's great play. Amusement follows their disgust, and after much fun the scenario is returned "Useless."

The morning mail brings to the luckless Biggs his returned manuscript. Furious, he tears it to pieces, throwing it all about. The servant is called and the great work of his brain is swept into the dust pan. Biggs returns to his bookkeeping, a sadder but a wiser man.

THE DUKE'S DILEMMA (April 2).—It was a fortunate happening for his Grace, the Duke of Niesenstein, that a company of players were in the immediate neighborhood of his castle. The Duke was alone—his court, which had been so notoriously brilliant, had deserted him; his financial affairs which had been for some time involved, had at last reached a crisis and be was on the verge of ruin and disgrace.

It was at this particular moment, most unfortunately, that the daughter of a reigning duke had come to link her fortune, which was considerable, with his, and to become bis consort. The Duke was in despair. How should be receive them and, having received them, expect them to agree to the marriage witb a duke who was almost a pauper. It was at this point of his reflections that he received a visit from the manager of a theatrical company, who wished to give a performance at the palace. The Duke had a sudden idea; why could not the company of players be his court ladies and gentlemen and the manager himself the court chamberlain. They could use their theatrical costumes for the masquerade. The manager readily agreed and the company arrived and filled their parts well, so well, in fact, that the Grand Duke became smitten with the leading lady and the leading man with the wife of a certain ambassador. The flirtations became so strong that the Duke and the theatrical manager began to fear that this new trouble was worse than the first but, fortunately for everyone, the Grand Duke, instead of being annoyed at the deception, laugbed beartily at the joke and a most satisfactory state of affairs resulted.

The comedy is beautifully staged and costumed and perfectly acted by an all-star cast. It is a wholesome story as interesting as it is amusing.

WITH THE EYES OF THE BLIND (April 1).—John McLane has, by his successful operations on Wall Street, almost ruined James Horton. It would be quite possible for him without much loss or inconvenience to save Horton, but he is very hard in business matters and will not "let up" notwithstanding the fact that James Horton comes to his bouse to plead with him; in fact he refuses to see him—tears up his card and insults him by sending the servant back witb it. Poor Horton is crushed and in a hopeless state of worry when he arrives home. His son Walter, who is just off to the club, insists upon knowing the cause of his dejection, and is very much incensed wben he hears it, and makes up his mind to go and see McLane and tell him what he thinks of him.

In the meantime McLane has forgotten all about business and Horton and everything but the one object of all bis love, his blind daughter Nora. A great specialist has seen her and has asserted that he can restore her sight. Nora is a very lovable girl, with all the wonderful intuition and highly developed sense of touch of the blind. She has left her father downstairs in the library. She bears him go out.

Just as her father goes outside tbe house young Horton arrives at the door. He asks McLane for a few moments' conversation. McLane refuses and young Horton calls bim a coward. McLane, not wishing for a scene on his own doorstep, asks him into the library. They have a stormy altercation in which McLane is accidentally killed with a paper knife. Nora hears him fall and runs downstairs into the room before Horton has time to escape. He sits in a chair and feigns sleep. Nora touches him lightly on the face, thus impressing his features upon her mind. She steps forward wonderingly—finds her dead father and Horton has escaped.

A year later Nora has been successfully operated upon and bas recovered her sight. Her father's slayer has never been discovered and the tragedy is a thing of the past. Nora goes into society and begins to meet people. One of her earliest encounters at a house party is Walter Horton. He, of course, recognizes her at once, but she does not know him. It is obvious that they are in love witb eacb other from the first. Horton tries to avoid her, but fate seems to throw them together. At last be throws all scruples to the wind and tells ber of his love and, with the first embrace she touches his face with her fingers and learns who he really is. The dream of happiness is over.

AMERICAN

CUPID THROWS A BRICK (April 7).—Jim Reynolds worked by day in the village brickyard. And Jim loved pretty Mabel Whitaker very much, but Mabel gave her affection to Bob Warren, another brickyard worker, who called on her often. One day the hopelessly smitten Jim saw Bob go into a saloon. He remonstrated and Bob advised him to mind his own business. The following day in tbe brickyard Bob hauled a flask from his pocket. Jim took it from him with the remark, "You'll have to cut that out if you're going to marry Mabel." Bob's reply was to pick up a brick and heave it. Jim took tbe brick on the side of his head and for days was missed at bis work.

But—and here is where Cupid stepped in to adjust destinies—Jim saw much of Mabel and Mabel's faith in Bob waned in proportion as she grew to love Jim. A day came when the boys caught Bob. They were treating him roughly when Jim interfered and bid them leave Bob alone. They left and Mabel came. Bob, who had thought Jim dead, was so overcome as to offer his hand. For reply Jim stooped, picked up another brick and handed it to him with a look at Mabel, saying, "Hit me again, Bob, and maybe she'll marry me."

THE HOMESTEAD RACE (April 10).—Ben Halliday came to the Big N ranch for rest. He soon fell in love with charming Carrie Wilkins, daughter of the ranch owner. She showed him a letter from Jim Wells, the distant land agent, telling her that he would obtain an excellent homestead if she burried on at once and filed on it.

Ralph Cunningham overheard tbe conversation, and later a gust of wind swept the letter out of the open window to him. He picked it up, saw that he had sufficient money to file himself, and rushed for the barn to get a horse. Meanwhile the letter was missed and the empty stable gave a reason.

And then Ben Halliday took a hand. He found anotber horse and a mighty chase ensued. Over bill and dale the pair galloped, until, overtaken, Ralph got off his horse, held Ben at the point of his gun, took Ben's borse and made away. But all luck had not deserted the apparent loser. Stopping a passing automobile, he climbed in and again overtook bis enemy. Both arrived at practically tbe same time at Wells' office. Ben, a fraction of an instant ahead, leaped in and bolted tbe door. After the necessary papers had been made out, Wells gave him bis gun. Ben crept around to the front of the house and got the drop on Ralph, who stood, revolver in hand, confronting the door.

A FALSE FRIEND (April 3).—Tom Morton, in love with Elsie, is unaware that bis friend, Jack Winters, also loves her and is trying to win her away from him. While out riding one day Tom sees a little Indian cbild playing with a rattlesnake. He shoots the rattler and thereby gains the gratitude of the child's mother. Returning to her hut with the child, the motber is beaten by her husband, Sancho, wbile he is in a drunken frenzy, and she, swearing vengeance, follows him with a gun. In the meantime Tom and Sancho meet and bave an altercation. As Tom draws his gun, the squaw shoots from ambush and Sancho drops dead. Men rushing out of the store find Tom with his gun drawn and he is accused of the murder. Jack, who has been attracted by the queer action of the squaw, follows her and witnesses the firing of the shot, but remains silent, planning to have Tom convicted of the murder and thereby winning Elsie. The day before the trial, Jack frightens the squaw into leaving by telling her that she is suspected of the murder, and she, after a night of wandering, falls exhausted at the door of Elsie's home. While being cared for by Elsie and her mother the squaw recognizes a picture of Tom, and, upon being told the cause of Elsie's grief, she confesses that she killed Sancho. Elsie immediately takes her to the courthouse and she tells her story. As she finishes, the exposure and the wounds inflicted by her husband prove fatal, and she falls dead at the feet of the man she has saved.

THE ANGEL OF MERCY (April 8).—A Red Cross nurse, Florence Valfontaine, obtains a permit to go to the front. War is threatened between France and a hostile nation. The troops of botb nations are mobilizing.

At the headquarters, at the same time with the nurse, is a courier from the Frencb lieutenant-general. He puts in his bag important papers. A man, acting as a servant, takes unusual interest.

After the courier has departed, the servant spy sends a telegram. "Courier leaves tonight. Will be interesting to know what bag contains."

Two accomplices of the spy board the train with the courier and enter the same compartment. The nurse takes this train also and enters the next compartment. As the train is passing through a tunnel she hears a noise. Looking through a window she sees the courier being overpowered by the secret emissaries. The latter are about to throw him into the inky black of the tunnel. As she looks with horror-stricken eyes one of the emissaries sees her. Conscious that she has been apprehended and fearful of consequences, she goes out upon the small footboard and crawls along to another compartment just as the emissaries thrust their heads out of the window to seek her.

At the first station the nurse informs an officer of the crime. Men rush back to where the courier had been thrown from the train. They find him, seriously wounded. A few minutes later a train would have come along and death would have been his portion. The courier tells the nurse that his despatches were stolen. One contained information that a convoy of war supplies was scheduled to cross the frontier on that day for headquarters. It is understood then that the enemies' purpose is to wreck the train. The nurse, with special officers, rush in an automobile to the place where they know the secret emissaries would try to derail the train. It is a mad race. They arrive just in time to overpower the spies as they are about to pull the switch, which would have sent the train to destruction.

BY DESIGN OF HEAVEN (State Right Feature).—Sweet and pure and simple was the life of Yolande, the lacemaker; beautiful her love for Peter Claus, the son of the Alderman. Warm was her maidenly heart for this Dutch boy and often over her lacework she dreamed of a little cottage by the Zuyder Zee and of the little nesting loves that some day might come to gladden her heart. But, alas, there was an obstacle. Yolande was poor and her father could quickly count the gold pieces in the stocking, and Peter was the son of a rich man. And so there came to her disturbing thoughts. She feared that ber love could never bear fruit; that her heart must flutter its wings impotently over the abyss whicb separates the poor from the wealthy.

"We are humble folk, dear Peter," she said one day as she felt his kisses against her lips and the thrill of his arms around her. "Will not your father steel his heart against our marriage?"

A man of business was Peter's father and one to whom love was a commerce as well as a thing of beauty and a joy forever. His ambitions for his son were large, and he longed to see his boy united with one of the great families of Holland. But, when he received the word from Yolande's father concerning the wish of his daughter and that of the Alderman's son the Alderman wrote from his heart, as well as from his head: "Not entirely do I oppose the marriage of the children, but as I am giving 5,000 florins to Peter, it is only fair tbat your girl should have tbe same amount. If you cannot arrange this we remain as good friends as before."

Sad were the eyes of Yolande, long tbe droop of her pretty lips, as her father read to her this message. "Five thousand florins is such a vast sum—where on earth or in beaven could she or her father get it?" It seemed impossible now that she would ever feel the thrill of the little gold band upon her finger and the joy and the pride of being the daughter-in-law of the great Alderman.

Against this dictum of the material mind she was strong. The fire blazed in her eyes as she sat down to write to Peter that the riches of tbeir love would be worth more to them than the florins in the coffers of the bankers. She wrote: "Dear One: Father can give to me only 2,000 florins. Surely you will not make me unhappy because of the absence of 3,000 florins. Do we need money when we love? I can do much with my fingers, and willingly would I work. Yours for all eternity, Yolande."

Though the heart aches, on we must go with our daily duties, and Yolande continued at the school of the lacemakers. Busy were her nimble hands over the filmy fabric one day wben the town crier's voice was heard. She, with her sisters in labor, quickly abandoned tbeir little tables to hasten to the windows where outside in the center of an attentive crowd stood the town crier. This was his message: "Her Gracious Majesty has decided to institute a competition amongst the lace workers, who have done so much for the glory and wealth of our country. The first prize, 5,000 florins, will be given from Her Majesty's private purse."

Swiftly beat the pulse of hope in Yolande's heart as she listened. Five thousand florins meant more than that pleasure to her. It meant love and the little cottage by the windmill, and the little things in after years who, with their tiny hands, would pull at her skirts as she went about her household duties. Yes, but how was she to win the competition? She was young and the skill of lacemaking with her was incomparable to that art wbich had come through experience to older hands. But hope she would, and she would find the way.

In every kind of mill in Holland hearts beat quickly, women chatted and the spindles whirled. Women forgot to talk about their ills and the doings of their neighbors. Their one topic was the Queen's competition and the five thousand florins. Yolande for days had thought and thought and thought of some new, beautiful and original design which, under her agile fingers, could be woven into the lace creation which indeed would be to the Queen's taste. And then inspiration came. She would invoke the aid of Our Lady of the Distaff, Patron Saint of the Lacemakers. To the church Yolande went, and in the stilly twilight of the cathedral she knelt on the cold stones and lifted her voice in supplication. This was her invocation: "Oh! Gracious Lady of the Distaff, give, I pray, my trembling hand, the art and skill to trace a flower with all the beauty of thine own star."

The spirit brightening the roses in her cheeks, Yolande traced homeward her steps. The hour was late, and into her bed she crept. Her thoughts were only of Our Lady of the Distaff and of the expected inspiration. As her consciousness slowly fleeted it appeared that she saw Our Lady of the Distaff descend from heaven and stop outside her door. But when she awoke from sleep it was only to gaze into nothingness. But there on the mullioned pane of the window glass she saw, formed by the hand of frost, a beautiful design in the white. This was the miraculous delineation of fate. She felt this was the answer to her prayer that Our Lady of the Distaff had drawn with the cold but kindly hand of winter that which was to winf or her happiness and love.

Swiftly pencil and paper brought Yolande, and upon her knees she knelt before the table and swiftly copied the design before it could be snatched from her by some mischievous elf. It was the design celestial.

The April sun was a harbinger of joy. It was noised abroad to hearts envious, to hearts which could rejoice in the gladness of another, that the design of Yolande, the little lacemaker, beloved by Peter, the Alderman's son, was to be the winner of the Queen's prize.

On the day of announcement, when all the townfolk gathered in the public square and the clatter of the wooden shoes had hushed in expectancy, the Burgomaster in his deep bass which sifted through his bushy beard like the winds through the summer foliage announced that the Queen looked with favor upon the design of Yolande, and that she was to receive the prize of five thousand florins, that she had won the laureate of the Queen's competition.

Days have sped by and Yolande has passed from the sweetheart without a dowry to a wife with a dowry. They are living their appreciation to Our Lady of the Distaff and knowing the joys of the glad, clean things.

THE WANDERER (April 7).—A symbolic story illustrating how at the psychological moment of temptation, only a touch of an influence of good is necessary to prevent the wrecking of three lives, all of which, while close to the brink, only need a deterring hand to save them from themselves and the fruits of their evil passions.

In the valley the world best "eternal triangle" is being worked, but between a husband, a much younger wife and "one who covets." On the heights, the Shepherd hears the call and for the nonce becomes a wanderer and descends into "the valley of Passions and Pain."

It is the gentle, unfelt, almost unseen influence of the wanderer that stops a maddened husband from first murder and then suicide, exposes the frailty of a wife to her own consideration and points to her the grim consequences of a moment's folly, and finally takes the "one who covets" away from the born passions of the valley a far journey up the heights, and disaster to three souls averted, the wanderer, against the Good Shepherd, returns to his peacefully grazingship.

REX

PURE GOLD AND DROSS (April 13).—A young man possessed of moderate means meets a young actress—a woman of irreproachable character and of great intelligence. The infatuation is mutual and a hasty marriage is the result.

The couple go to the West, where the man gets into the clutches of a plausible mining shark, who takes his money in exchange for mining land which he firmly believes to be of no value.

Following a year of hopeless endeavor and useless, unremitting toil, they are left penniless, and, to add to their cares, a baby has arrived and must be provided for. A big-hearted man takes a fancy to the young husband and assists him. The husband shows his gratitude both to the man and to his daughter, and his attitude toward this girl is misunderstood by the suffering wife.

The unwarranted and cruel gossip of the thoughtless villagers strengthens her suspicions; and her state of health, the death of her babe and poverty leave her despondent, and it only takes a letter of invitation from her former friends to decide her to go quietly away. She sells her engagement ring to pay for her passage and goes.

The husband, on his way home, wanders by the river bank and discovers the gold he has been seeking for so long. He hurries on to tell his wife the glad news and finds her gone. He is heartbroken, and although the source of the gold is traced and he achieves wealth, it is all as nothing to him in the loss of his wife. He stands it as long as he can and decides to end it all. The wife, unable to bear the thought of him there in his loneliness, and longing for the freedom and the hills, returns in time to prevent a tragedy—and all is well.

AS FATE WILLS (April 10).—Ill and without money, hungry and without a home, Jack Sheldon, destitute, is walking the streets, begging, accompanied by his child, Edythe. The girl is crying for food. Sheldon is famished for lack of nourishment. Their appeals for assistance meet with no response until Mrs. Preston, wealthy, picks them up in her automobile. In the machine, Sheldon becomes delirious and is taken to a hospital, where laboring under a strange hallucination, and evading the vigilance of the attendants, he escapes and wanders into the mountains in a demented condition, finally stumbling into a sheepherder's camp, where he obtains food and protection from the weather. Recovering from the delirium and regaining his strength, Sheldon is about to depart from the camp, when the returning goatherder falls from a high rock, receiving injuries which prove fatal. Nursed by Sheldon, the goatherder, before dying, proves his gratitude by leaving Sheldon all his earthly possessions.

Little Edythe, left in the hospital is adopted by Mrs. Preston, the woman who had offered assistance to the girl and her father on the day of the opening of the story. Mrs. Preston, with much wealth, rears Edythe with every luxury at command, but never discloses to the girl her real identity or tells her the story of her father.

Fifteen years after her adoption, Edythe and her girl friends go picnicking in the mountain, inadvertently picking out a spot near Sheldon's camp as a picnic ground. Sheldon, attracted to Edythe by strangely familiar resemblance to his daughter, enters into a conversation with her, but is disappointed when he fails to secure any information of value. As the girl leaves the camp Sheldon utters a prayer that his girl, wherever she may be, is safe from harm.

Dabbling in a mountain stream, Sheldon discovers a placer goldfield. He abandons his goat ranch to the care of a herder, and leaves for town. Cashing in his gold dust, Sheldon is now possessed of much wealth and is determined to find his daughter. Standing on a curb, Sheldon sees Mrs. Preston and Edythe enter their motor car. Edythe fails to recognize the goatherder. When entering the machine, Edythe loses her purse. Sheldon finds it in the street and traces Edythe to the Preston home by means of a visiting card, after having had his beard removed and having donned city togs.

Sheldon tells to Mrs. Preston and Edythe the story of his life and adventures from the time he escaped from the hospital until he met Edythe in the mountains, gradually leading up to the climax, which he springs when he declares that if Edythe will look on her arm in a certain place, she will find a scar of a certain description. Thoughts long dormant flit through the girl's mind. There is a flash of recognition from the girl and she slowly puts her arms around her father's neck. Sheldon tells Mrs. Preston of his gratitude to her and of his wealth and ability to care for the girl. Edythe reluctantly breaks away from the final embrace with her foster mother. Edythe and her father, happily reunited. walk slowly away.

POWERS

THE FEAR (April 11).—Hugh Webster is a strong man in all but the control of a violent temper, which has been a curse to him for the better part of his life. He does not possess the saving grace of humor, and as is usual in such cases his companions make life somewhat hard for him and subject him to many jokes. He does his best to take their badinage, but he does not accept their pranks with good grace, and while upon a hunting trip he one day lets his temper assert itself, and, in a frenzy of rage, he strikes down his best friend, and seeing what he has done, he flees in terror into the depths of the forest.

His friend is not badly injured, and as the whole party feel sorry for their conduct and know that their chaff was ill-advised, they endeavor to find him, well knowing that he is lost and that his chances for remaining alive are very slim. They get near him at times, but, haunted with the awful fears and believing that he is hunted, he eludes them and eventually throws them off the scent and gets lost.

He is found in an exhausted condition by the dog of a lumberman, and is rescued by the man, who takes him to the lumber camp. He gets word that his friend is all right, and returns home a cured man and with his temper forever in check.

GOING FOR FATHER (April 13).—Father didn't get home from work and mother had supper ready. Dad was a workingman, and when he stopped at the sitting-room of the little corner saloon some of the boys invited him to join them in a little card game.

He got interested and forgot that it was supper time.

Mother sent little Clara and Willie to bring father home when the clock pointed to 7:30, but there was a piano in this sitting-room and some music, and so the youngsters began to enjoy things and failed to bring home their tardy dad. Eight o'clock and no father and no children. So mother sent Muriel; 8:30 and no Muriel, no father and no children, so grandpa was sent.

As each one arrived the gay little gathering in the sitting-room invited them to become members of the party, and they began to have such a pleasant time that they forgot about supper being ready.

The soup began to boil over, and so grandma was sent. But when grandma arrived there were some traveling musicians playing in the sitting-room and she, too, joined in the gaiety.

Finally mother herself decided to go and see what the trouble was, and put on her shawl and headed for the sitting-room.

A timid policeman heard the uproar when mother found the whole family having such a good time, and began to give them a piece of her mind. Mr. Cop thought it was a riot and, calling some assistance, the entire family was arrested.

On the way to the police station they saw great clouds of smoke coming out of their home, and everyone went to the rescue to put out the fire. After fighting their way through the dense smoke into the kitchen, they discovered that it was only the soup that had boiled over, and nothing else had been damaged, and so, supperless, the whole family was put to bed.

On the same reel:

THE OCTOPUS.—On the same reel with this clever comedy will be found one of those very fine scientific subjects.

This time it is the Octopus which is shown, and as the animal has been so often pictured in cartoons, where it is shown in this country as representing one of the great trusts, this subject is unusually interesting.

The octopus is found on the coasts of the tropical zones, frequenting the rocky shores, and it is exceptionally active.

They are regularly placed on sale in the markets of Smyrna and Naples and the bazaars of India.

RELIANCE

THE HALF-WIT (March 29).—Bud Johnson, a poor, half-witted youth, is in love with Ruth Bradley, the belle of the village, who, through sympathy, has been very kind to him in many ways.

Ed Moore, a young farmer, who has been courting the girl, proposes and is accepted. Bud hears of this and is heartbroken. He goes to the girl and learns that she never cared for him. He is wild with brief and anger and plans some way in which he can revenge himself.

Ruth and Ed, finding a little objection at home, elope to the next village and are married. She writes home to her father, begging forgiveness. He softens and answers her letter, bidding her come home at once. When he mails it, however, it falls out of the chute and is found by the half-witted boy, who, seeing it is addressed to Ruth, opens and reads it. He tears it into bits, laughs to himself, and mutters that he will have his revenge at the price of Ruth and Ed's happiness.

The young people, receiving no answer, conclude that the old man will not relent. Ed goes to work in the city and they soon have their own home.

Repenting, Bud sets out to find them. After a search lasting two years, he finally locates them in time to save their baby's life and bring all three home to the waiting father. This much done, the poor, half-witted boy, asking forgiveness, dies, worn out by the strain of the past few years.

THE JUDGE'S VINDICATION (2-reel) (April 2).—Judge Harris, one of the most upright judges in the country, refuses to decide a case in favor of a certain powerful trust. The head of this trust vows he will break the judge and immediately sets about for some way to do it.

Not long afterward, at the instigation of the trust magnate, the judge is impeached.

His wife and daughter are heartbroken, but believe firmly in him. He goes to the magnate and pleads with him to no avail. He returns home broken in body and spirit.

His daughter Rose, seeing her father's condition, decides to see the tyrant herself. She does so but is only laughed at.

She goes to the courtroom and there meets a young reporter, who listens to her trouble. He has seen a package of letters pass from the secretary of the trust to the president and knows they are relative to her father's case. The thing is to get these letters.

He wants a story for his paper—and also wants to help the pretty girl—so he starts off with her. They drive to the president's house. The reporter enters, revolver in hand. Seeing the letters on the table, he grabs them, keeping the president at bay with his revolver. The president's lawyer, entering, tries to overpower the reporter, but in the struggle he gets away and dashes out of the house and into the waiting car.

The president orders his car and follows them but is unable to catch the smaller car.

The reporter and the girl get to the Senate chamber in time to produce the letters and change the verdict to a vote of unanimous acquittal.

She hurries home to tell her father and great joy is the result. The reporter, in his office, finishes a stirring article on the methods of a certain well-known trust. When this is safely on the press, he goes to the judge's house where much thanks and warm welcome await him.

MAJESTIC

A WELL-MEANT DECEPTION (March 30).—Bell, an amateur artist, who is financed by his uncle in his art studies, falls in love and marries a singer in a cafe. Uncle finds out about the marriage, and, thinking that any woman in such a position must necessarily be bad, he quarrels with his nephew and cuts off his allowance. Bell at first imagines that he can sell his pictures and get along without his uncle's assistance. He finds that his stuff is unsalable, the wolf is at the door, when his wife offers to go back to the cafe. Bell won't hear of it. The wife deceives him by telling him that she got a position as a teacher in a music school when in reality she goes back to the cafe. She earns good money and instructs an art dealer to buy some of her husband's pictures. Bell immediately gets a swelled head and tells his wife there is no need of her to work any more, but she, of course, knows better and insists on returning to work. Meantime the uncle accidentally meets the art dealer and finds out who the purchaser was of the nephew's pictures. He goes to interview the girl and is pleased with her goodness and sacrifice. A small fire starts in the music school where Bell thinks his wife is working. He enters the school to find his wife never worked there at all and has been deceiving him. Full of jealous rage, he finds his wife in the cafe and is about to attack her, but is prevented by uncle and the dealer, who later explain the situation, and Bell, recognizing his wife's sacrifice and that he lacks the true genius to make a successful artist, accepts a position in his uncle's business.

A STUDY IN SOCIOLOGY (April 1).—To protect his daughter from fortune-hunters, the old millionaire leaves a will directing that if she does not marry a man of good reputation and prominence, his fortune is to go to his relatives. An old roue relation of the heiress introduces a professional gambler to her as Parkman Dickerson, the author of a book on sociology, which she much admires. Disgusted with the prominent men that have courted her and admiring the author of "My Work Among the Workers," also somewhat fascinated by the smooth crook, the girl accepts him. He gives her a woman's diamond ring which has been given him by a young man, Travis, who has lost all his money in his gambling house. In order to fit herself to become the wife of the sociologist, the girl decides to do as he has done, study the workers by being one of them. She disguises herself as a maid and goes out to service in a wealthy woman's house. A love affair springs up between herself and the chauffeur at the house unbidden. Young Travis, whose mother's house it is, refused money by the mother, steals a pearl pin. He also tries to kiss the new maid, who slaps his face and decides to leave. As she is going the theft of the chain is discovered. Her suit case is opened, and while the chain is not found, the diamond which the gambler gave her is discovered. It proves to be Mrs. Travis'. The chain is demanded from the girl and as she cannot produce it, she is arrested. Mrs. Travis, her son and an officer are getting into the car to go to the police station and enter the complaint. The chauffeur drives the car off before the officer can get in and speeds it into the country, the rich old woman, her son and the butler banging on the glass of the limousine in protest. On a country road the car breaks down, the son and the butler go for the chauffeur, who fights them both. In the fight the son's coat is torn and the chain drops from his pocket. While his mother is denouncing him, the chauffeur grabs the girl's suit case and bids her follow him. He takes her to a country station, and, as she has no money, gives her what he has and a ring of his. She goes. Returning to her former life she finds herself pursued by the memory of the young workman. She dismisses the gambler and sends to the employment office to see if they can find the chauffeur. They do. When he comes she disguises herself as a maid, and, overjoyed at meeting her, he proposes. They are married, thus losing the fortune by the will. The rich relatives gather to dispoil the house and enjoy their triumph. The bride and bridegroom enter and are bidden to take themselves off. The bride shows them a picture of her husband in a newspaper and the headlines announcing that:

"Parkman Dickerson, the noted sociologist, marries an heiress. Both met while disguised as servants."

As this complies with the will, the relatives retreat and happiness advances to take possession of the home.

EXCELSIOR

TEMPERAMENTAL ALICE (April 7).—Alice's father, a rather lonely invalid, advertises for a companion and secretary.

Young Ralph Finn answers the ad in person and gets the position. He has just brought his mother South for her health and is very glad of the work.

Alice, a great favorite with the boys, tries to break the new secretary's heart. But it is no use. Ralph has eyes for no one but the invalid and, despite her various couquetries, pays no attention to her whatever.

She is angered at this unusual treatment and one day while caught outdoors in a shower, she stays there to make Ralph call for her with umbrella and raincoat.

But Ralph merely sends the gardener for the girl and she is furious. This time she makes up her mind that she will get even.

Seeing her father give some money into Ralph's hands, she manages to get it and hide it. Ralph is horrified at the disappearance of the money, but he is not believed and Alice's father discharges him at once.

A few days later as he is wheeling his mother along the street in her invalid chair, Alice's motorcar crashes into them. The mother is hurt, but recovers. Alice tells her father the truth and Ralph is reinstalled in his old position.

The girl's devotion to his mother wins Ralph's heart, and before long the past is entirely forgotten and a bright future looms before them.

THANHOUSER

THE WOMAN WHO DID NOT CARE (April 1).—She was beautiful, but heartless and ambitious, and in the end she was deservedly punished.

The girl was the daughter of a poor miner and was devotedly loved by a man in her own station of life. She accepted his attentions willingly until a young engineer came along and paid court to her. She then dismissed her first suitor, not caring what became of him. Her father made a lucky strike, and they removed to the city to enjoy their wealth. This sealed the fate of the second suitor, for a rich man became smitten with the girl and she accepted his advances. Perhaps she would have married him in time had it not been that she aroused the enmity of an old witch, deeply skilled in magic. The witch, to have revenge, brought a scarecrow to life, supplied him with a title, and seeming great wealth, and ordered him to win the girl for his bride. He did this easily, for the idea of being a noblewoman appealed to the heartless girl. Her triumph was complete until the wedding day, when the witch appeared just as the ceremony was completed. She jeered at her victim, then transformed the "nobleman" back into a scarecrow again, so the girl was stricken down in what she had believed to be her hour of success.

The story is allegorical, of course, but it carries its warning to those who marry for social position, and not for love.

THE SPOILED DARLING'S DOLL (April 4).—Her parents said she was a darling. The long-suffering servants whispered that she was "a spoiled brat." From the time that she could first crawl and talk she had had her own way, and that is a mighty bad thing for any girl to have, even a "darling."

Her nurse did not like her, and who could blame the poor woman. The little girl never obeyed, always argued and protested. She smashed her toys, and tore her clothes, and screamed so her sick mother took a turn for the worse. Her parents, however, were satisfied she would outgrow her unpleasant habits, and sure enough she did.

One evening the nurse rushed into her room, attracted by the cries of the child. She had tumbled out of bed, but strange to say, was not peevish. She apologized to the nurse for causing any trouble, and altogether was so sweet that the nurse was convinced the child was seriously ill. Her father questioned her, and the little one told him of the remarkable conduct of her newest and biggest doll. It seems that the doll came to life, treated the little girl as she had treated her nurse, made life a misery to her, and taught her that selfish people cause much unnecessary sufferings. So she (the little girl) had firmly decided to be good in the future.

What did the family do? Well, the mother wept, and said she feared her darling was too good to live. The father asked if she had had hot mince pie before she went to bed, while the nurse said, "One never can tell what a child will do." Several doctors were called in and they shook their heads gravely, and charged fat fees for saying, "Well, well." The doll really knew what had happened, but she never said a word. It is hard to get dolls to talk, although they have been known to wink when pleased.

It is said that the spoiled darling's doll winked.

GREAT NORTHERN

A SKIPPER'S STORY (April 5).—Jack is a skipper, and, with three of his seafaring friends, he is boasting of his wonderful accomplishments while seated in a tavern. Lions, tigers, sharks and whales hold no fear for him, and countless have been his adventures and triumphs. Whatever Jack's qualities as a brave man may have been, he proves to be a poor storyteller and his pals quickly tire of his recital. They decide to test his bravery and buy from a costumer a huge shark's head, tiger's skin and a wooden leg, and, with this outfit, they hurry to the swimming bath, where an appointment has been made. It is with difficulty that Jack is coaxed to enter the water, but when he finally consents, he is startled by the cry of "Shark" and, looking over his shoulder, sees the dummy head in the water, the supposed fish being propelled by one of Jack's friendly jokers. He shouts in terror and faints when he arrives at the landing stage. So much for the first installment of his punishment for being a boaster. The trio of jokers next bribe a lion tamer to allow them the use of one of his cages, and when Jack is "half seas over" he is placed in a comfortable position in the empty cage. One of his pals dons the tiger skin and waits patiently until the roaring of the wild beasts in the adjoining cages awaken the boastful hero. When he finds that he is in the same cage with what appears to be a ferocious tiger, he bound for the open gate and dashes madly for his good ship. The "tiger" follows, but Jack reaches his cabin before the animal overtakes him. He sinks exhausted upon a bunk, and a few minutes later the jocular trio of old tars file in and have a good hearty laugh at his expense.

"Never again with any of that boasting stuff," sighs Jack as his three friends sit at the side of his bunk and chide him for his cowardice.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 14 (March 31).

HOW PLASTER IS OBTAINED (April 1).—Although plaster of paris is a very common commodity, the methods by which it is obtained are entirely unfamiliar to the general public, which is only one of the many reason why this film will be of keen interest. Gypsum, the substance from which the plaster is obtained, is dynamited from an immense quarry and then it is transported to the kilns. Three days are required for calcination, after which it is more easily powdered. The grinding process is an antique one, but interesting, a five-ton millstone being used. The powdered plaster passes through a fine sieve and is then packed and shipped.

On the same reel:

THE MOROS.—An aerial turn with a new thrill in it. The beautiful coloring makes it an additionally attractive offering.

THE ENGINEER'S DAUGHTER (April 2).—Lillian Wharton, the daughter of the engineer of the cyclone express, is carried away by a band of outlaws. They hold her a prisoner, but, after watching eagerly for the opportunity, Lillian gets one of the bandits unawares, and taking his gun, hold up the party and escapes. She is pursued, but has not gone far before meeting with her father, who has left his engine on a siding and is enjoying his lunch. Lillian hands the gun to her father, and while he holds the outlaws at bay, Lillian races to her father's locomotive. Her courage and skill, after a wild ride at breakneck speed, are responsible for the return of a posse of cowboys, who, catching the outlaws between two fires, soon eliminate the possibility of their causing further trouble.

On the same reel:

CAIRO (EGYPT) AND ITS ENVIRONS.—A very interesting series of views of an interesting section of the world.

THERE SHE GOES (April 3).—Hans Schmidt, who owns a delicatessen store in the little Western town of Clarksville, has a very pretty daughter, Lena, who was determined to marry Jim Jackson, a cowboy employed in the neighborhood. Hans objected to this wedding, and to prevent it, he locked Lena in her room. Jackson had a scheme to distract the old man's attention while he and Lena got married. He offered to bet Hans $50.00 that he could not keep time with the swaying pendulum of the clock, saying, "Here she is; there she goes," for half an hour. Hans decided to try it. While he was thus busily engaged, Jim slipped away with Lena and married her. And all during the marriage ceremony Hans kept saying, "Here she is; there she goes," never suspecting that his daughter had gone.

WHIFFLES TRIES MOVING PICTURE ACTING (April 4).—Whiffles, the awkwardly funny comedian, after reading an ad, offers his services to Pathe Freres as a moving picture actor. The illness of a leading man gives Whiffles an opportunity to show his ability. His experiences as a lover are highly diverting, as, in a situation of this kind, Whiffles is unequalled. A few days later, however, the husband of Whiffles' leading lady sees the picture in a theatre. Being of a mean and jealous disposition he challenges to a duel. Whiffles accepts, and, although a loser, the manner of his defeat will win him many new admirers and delight his old friends.

On the same reel:

AN EXCURSION TO THE GRANDE CHARTREUSE (France).—The most interesting scenic picture published in many a day.

THE BROKEN IDYLL (April 5).—A very pretty girl, spending a vacation on a ranch, becomes infatuated with a handsome cowboy. He presents her with a necklace, which further delights her. A chance meeting with the cowboy's baby daughter, however, informs her that she is the innocent cause of another woman's suffering. Her dream of love thus shattered provides a scene that is touchingly pathetic. The girl, compelled to choose between love and righteousness, handles the situation in a manner that proves her to be a strong character.

her father, knowing that the boy is something of a ne'er-do-well, forbids the match and orders Harry from the house. The young people meet clandestinely and go for a walk over the hills. Myrtle accidentally stumbles on the root of a tree and falls over a cliff. Harry runs to her aid but finds her unconscious and, thinking her dead, runs away. The father, who has followed them, discovers Myrtle and carries her home, where she revives.

In the meantime Harry has gone to the city to find employment, and some time later Myrtle also secures work in the city. One evening she misses her train home, not arriving until late. Her father, in a rage, accuses her of meeting Harry against his wishes, and turns her from home. Harry has lost his position and contemplates suicide. Myrtle, in despair, intends to do the same thing. By chance of fate they both come to the same dock to jump into the water. She sees him preparing to jump, and rushes to his aid, but is too late. Just as she places her hand on his shoulder he jumps. Two police officers see her, and think she has pushed him overboard. She is arrested and accused of his murder. Harry has not drowned, and discovers later that she is accused of his murder. He comes forward with the information that he is the man who jumped into the water, and she is released. Her father, seeing their devotion, accepts Harry as his son-in-law.

PILOT

IN THE BATTLE'S SMOKE (April 3).—The Warren and Niles families have a feud. Bert Warren has killed Zeke Niles' father. Niles returns to get revenge. He follows him to the field where he is plowing and secretes himself in the bushes and shoots the old man. Warren's daughter and son Bert arrive on the spot as the old man is dying and Bert promises his father to carry on the feud until the Niles family is wiped out. Niles and his sister, Beth, receive a letter from their uncle up North asking them to go and make their home with him. Bert Warren visits the deserted hut of the Niles and discovers, to his anger, that his proposed victim has flown the country. The war breaks out. Zeke Niles enlists in the Federal army and Bert Warren joins the Confederates. A battle between the opposing armies takes place and the Confederates are beaten and are forced to make their retreat, leaving many of the wounded of the North and South on the battlefield, among them being the two feudists. Zeke Niles is severely wounded and his cries for help reach Bert Warren's ears. In the moonlight they do not recognize each other and Warren makes his way to a small stream in order to get water for the wounded soldier. He returns with a canteen and is about to give his enemy a drink when a shell bursts near them. The light from the exploding shell illuminated the faces of the two men. They recognize each other and Bert Warren is about to kill the man who shot his father. Niles begs for mercy. The shell has set fire to the undergrowth and in a few moments the flames surround them. Bert Warren tells Zeke that he will not kill him, but leave him to be burned alive. As he leaves the scene of the fire a vision of his sister appears, telling him that two wrongs never make a right, and to let the feud end there. He quickly makes up his mind and, rushing back to the place where he left his old enemy to perish in the flames, he takes him upon his back and carries him to safety.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Eclair

"Marry in Haste" is an excellent story. Some opportunities to make the most of the comic situations have been disregarded, it is true, but on the whole the above would pass as a very satisfactory comedy.

Rex

"Her Friend the Chauffeur" is full of snappy action, and the smooth, intelligent rendition of this excellent little comedy is a delight to the lover of clean fun.

Nestor

"Superstitious Mary" is another comedy of merit. The mishaps of Mary's wedding day on Friday, the 13th, culminating with the intoxication of the bridegroom, and her elopement with the man of her heart give plenty of opportunity for legitimate laughter.

"Mum's the Word" on the same reel is truly original. It treats of the experiences of a young reporter who was sent to cover an institution for the deaf and dumb. It is exceedingly funny, and will fit in any program.

Mecca

"The Criminals" is a drama in which talented players have done their utmost toward making the film an artistic success. With the exception of one or two inconsistencies, and a little indistinctness with regard to the arrival at the finale the production is a most excellent one.

Powers

"Do It Now" is an original idea in comedy, and very good, and shows the trouble a man can get into by a too profuse distribution of "Do It Now" cards in his capacity of husband, father and friend.

Thanhouser

"The Wax Lady" displays originality of theme, and the work of those impersonating the wax figures in the wicked clothing man's window is exceedingly fine. The above might be classed as comedy drama.

"For Her Boy's Sake" is tremendously human and full of pathos. This film has also been beautifully produced.

Imp

"To Reno and Back"—great comedy! King Baggott in the male lead is a surprise with his fun-making faculties. This production is full of action, is smooth and consistent and a legitimate reason is noticeable for every act and situation.

Essanay

"Finnegan" is also excellent in comedy. The mix-up of wives and husbands, through a similarity of conditions, is a scream.

Vitagraph

"The Strength," an Alaskan drama, is most fascinating in production and acting. The atmosphere of Alaskan wilds is there and it appeals.

Gaumont

"Suzanne's Necklace" is exceedingly clever and well produced. There does not seem to be one little flaw in the production of this pretty bit. It is a daintily staged burglary. The burglar is one of the gentleman kind, and falls in love with the pretty dancer whose jewels he has intended to steal. The film ends by the young woman receiving from the burglar on the following morning note with which to settle some few debts which he accidentally finds are on her list of worries.

"A lesson in Love" from the same firm is also very fine. This film is a snappy little comedy, beautifully staged and hand-colored.

Solax

"The Climax" is a well-acted drama of a very interesting sort. The story is food, and in fact this film may be classed among the best of Solax productions.

Bison 101

"A House Divided" in three reels is interesting in plot and as is usual with Bison films, the outdoor scenes, battle scenes and such, are well worth the evening. The character of the young woman, who evidently was hypnotized into betraying the secrets of the Federal army to the Union spies has been well wrought out by the clever little actress who played the role.

WILLIAM H. VAN WART

Secretary of the Grover Cleveland Birthplace Memorial Association, would like to receive the names and addresses of those who made moving picture films or other photographs of the dedication exercises at Caldwell, New Jersey, on March 18. His address is Box 501, Caldwell, or Room 1141, 346 Broadway, New York. 'Phone 4900 Franklin.

The taking of a telegram by the "Teeth Transmission Method" is demonstrated in one of the thrilling scenes of Selig's "Pauline Cushman," in which the heroine spy, secures valuable information regarding the movements of the Southern Army.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Few topical pictures have created greater interest in Washington than those of the Panama Canal taken by the Feature Film Manufacturing Company. The national importance of these films called to the theatres many who have never entered such houses before, but the personal element in the views, the fact that they held the pictures of President Taft of members of Congress, and other officials both of Washington and of Panama, caused a greater desire to see these particular scenes. Other pictures of the great waterway have visited the Capital City on other occasions, but nothing so thoroughly official and local as these. The Garden Theatre has exhibited the President Taft Panama Canal pictures several different times by request from patrons. At the initial performance Manager Tom Moore placed the mezzanine section of the theatre at the disposal of the officials of the government, and many of the Presidential party and their friends thoroughly enjoyed seeing themselves as others saw them while inspecting the greatest engineering work of the present age. The expressions of approval from these guests were most encouraging to the moving picture industry as well as the film company.

* * * *

The moving picture theatres were seen in very gay attire by the visitors to the inaugural ceremonies attending the coming of President Wilson. Flags, bunting, and additional lights made these places of amusement very attractive. Perhaps the most elaborate were: The Cosmos, Garden, Palace, Empress, Plaza, Virginia, Pickwick, Maryland and Colonial. Managers report excellent business during the inaugural week, and only words of praise were to be heard from the visitors. One of the houses contemplated contracting for vaudeville for three days as an "extra" attraction, but finally decided to let the pictures have the entire program. The result was that he exhibited to capacity houses all the while without the expense of the vaudeville. This proved that a good picture house needs no extra attraction.

* * * *

Tom Moore, manager of the Garden Theatre, secured the exclusive right for the taking of the tableaux of the suffragette parade on March 3. It is rumored that some other photographers were angry. The Garden also did some hustling on February 28th when the suffragette "hikers" from New York had reached Hyattsville on their way to Washington. J. Boyd Dexter, house manager of the Garden hurried to Hyattsville that morning, took pictures of the travelers at ten o'clock, and at five o'clock had the film on the screen. The "hikers" were delighted to see themselves as the camera saw them.

* * * *

The Empress has been presenting some of the big features of the foreign and American make. The recent showing of the fairy tale of Snow White brought a large contingent of the juvenile element to The Empress. The grown folks enjoyed the play equally as much.

* * * *

The recent appearance of Chas. B. Hanford in a repertoire of Shakespearean plays brought forth this remark from many who attended the performances, "I have only seen Romeo and Juliet (Merchant of Venice or some other play) in moving pictures, and I was anxious to hear the play on the stage." Perhaps the actor and his able company were not aware of it, but there were many picture fans listening to them during Hanford's recent visit to his home city. This only goes to strengthen the oft-repeated assertion that the motion picture industry is creating an appetite for the classics that schools and reading circles have not been able to accomplish.

* * * *

* * * *

A new picture theatre with a seating capacity of more than a thousand has recently opened in the resident section of the city. This is known as the Lyric, which has at once become popular on account of space, light, air and beauty. Manager Greenburg is quite proud of his house, which always presents an excellent program.

* * * *

The Garden exhibited the pictures of the suffragette parade of March 3d on March 5th. It was greatly applauded each time it held thé screen. The tableau and dancing scenes on the portico of the Treasury building were especially fine. It was rather disappointing to individual suffragettes when they could not find themselves in the picture.

TO A MOVING PICTURE

Amazing triumph of the wizard's art,
What potency thy magic skill hath wrought
To bring before my gaze, scenes far apart,
That otherwise would never come unsought.

This miracle, it doth to me appear
A wondrous concept of the things to be,
When earth and air are compassed by the seer
Their mysteries explained that all may see.

OPERATORS' CHAT

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC., LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 619
Office—133 Third Avenue.

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Inc., Local No. 1, is making great headway, and in a very short time will be one of the strongest organizations of operators in the United States. At the last meeting, which was held on March 17, 1913, six new members were obligated and ten applications for membership were placed before the body for consideration. Several new members were obligated at the headquarters of the union, it being impossible for these men to wait for the regular meeting night, they being employed with various road shows, and had to leave the city. These men promised to help the New York operators of Local No. 1 in their fight for justice at the next convention. There are forty-seven road men on the books of the local at present, and many more are sending in letters, asking information about the progress which is being made, and stating that they expect to be in New York soon to make application for membership. Local No. 1 has become quite an interesting factor not only in this country but in distant lands as well. The business representative was greatly surprised to receive a letter from East Rangoon, Burma, India, asking to give the writer information regarding the situation in New York City. The operator also stated that he would like to know the rules for joining a union, as he is one of the leading operators in India and has a lot of influence with operators in that country. No doubt this brother has been reading the "Operators' Chat" and in this way has become familiar with M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 of Greater New York. Not alone from India have letters to the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 of Greater New York been received but also from Port Elizabeth and Cape Town, South Africa. Several cities in England, also Germany, have communicated their best wishes for success in the endeavors of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 of Greater New York to secure justice, also many letters have been received from various locals of the I. A. T. S. E. throughout the country who mentioned the deplorable condition in the branch of Local No. 35, when they elected a scab strikebreaker as a president and still have him in office; the main query in these letters is "why does such a rotten condition exist and why is it not remedied?" The entire trend of the letters is most encouraging and at the coming convention no doubt many of the writers will be delegates and cause a substantial investigation without any "steam roller" tactics. Believe me, the band will play "There'll Be a Hot Time," and Local No. 35 will no doubt meet its "Waterloo" when the matter has been sifted to the bottom. Like Napoleon tried to conquer Europe, Local No. 35 has tried to grab the entire industry here in New York City, but up to the present time General "If" and General "Hopes" have failed to make any conquests.

During the recent inauguration of President Wilson at Washington, D. C., several of the members of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 of Greater New York took a holiday and visited the capital, and while they took the occasion to visit Local 224, I. A. T. S. E., they met President Spellbring and the members of that organization at their rooms, and from all reports given here they certainly must have had some "swell" time, for the boys say that the Washington local don't do things halfway, but clear to the handle.

Next regular meeting will be held Monday, April 7, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street. A full attendance is requested.

Application for membership can be made at the office, 133 Third avenue, near Fourteenth street, New York.

RALPH J. KNASTER,
Business Representative.

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH INSTALLATION. A Power's Cameragraph No. 6A has been installed in the St. Michael's School, Clinton avenue and High street, Hoboken, N. J., through the Universal Film Exchange of New York.

The Broadway Theatre, Forty-first street and Broadway, New York City, has installed two Power's Cameragraph No. 6A through the People's Vaudeville Company.

M. D. LIVINGSTON, sales representative for J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," left for a trip to Chicago on Tuesday of this week, calling at several of the towns en route going and coming. The purpose of the trip is to close pending deals on A. C. to D. C. Economizers, and to establish dealers' agencies for Power's, Simplex and Motiograph motion picture machines, as well as for the Hallberg specialties.

NEWMAN COMPANY EQUIPS EMPRESS THEATRE. The Newman Manufacturing Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and 101 Fourth avenue, New York City, report that they have just furnished the two Chicago theatres controlled by the Sullivan & Considine Company, the new Empress on Halstead street, and the Empress on Cottage Grove avenue, with brass frames and rail work. Mr. Lincoln, general manager of the Sullivan & Considine Company, called by long distance 'phone requesting one of the Newman boys to go to Chicago immediately and take his order, which represented quite a tidy sum. The Newman Company have just issued a new catalog showing brass frames and easels, German silver frames and oxidized frames and brass rail work and brass work of every description, which can be had upon request.

HALLBERG A. C. ECONOMIZERS in Thanhouser Studio. The Thanhouser Company have equipped their studio with new motion picture machines, operating on alternating current with Hallberg Standard A. C. Economizers. Mr. Hallberg reports that Quirk's Theatre, Fulton, N. Y., have just purchased through him a second Simplex M. P. Machine. Mr. Rufus A. Maltby, of Middletown, N. Y., a Power's No. 6A with Hallberg A. C. Economizer; Weinberg & Mines, 500 Atlantic avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., a Power's No. 6A.

The joke played on Mark Twain by one of his friends who mailed a letter from abroad addressed to "Mark Twain—God Knows Where" was recalled the other day when an envelope—entirely blank except for a rather indistinct newspaper portrait pasted on it—was mailed in Los Angeles. It found its way across the continent to Philadelphia and was duly delivered to Arthur V. Johnson, at the Lubin plant. This reads very much like a fish story, nevertheless it is true. Doubtless Mr. Wallace Clifton, of the Lubin Stock Company on the coast, saw that the envelope was put in the Philadelphia mail bag. The rest was easy for Arthur Johnson's face is as well known in the East as Mr. Taft's. However, it is a great example of the efficiency of Uncle Sam's service.

A NIGHT AT THE BOULEVARD

"Let's go down to the Cafe Boulevard—that restaurant that you read and hear so much about," remarked a friend who was visiting from the Middle West.

And thus it came about that we had a Night at The Boulevard. And such a night! Titillating memories will always be with me. Impressions of a night of fun and enjoyment such as seldom comes to the tired business man who seeks it in other quarters! And since that night I have been wondering, as I understand so many others before me have wondered, too, what there was about it that leaves such an effect upon one's mind, and causes him to chuckle with glee every time he recalls the incidents of the night? Some say it is the Bohemian atmosphere. Others say it is because one is free from restraint—which in a measure explains it.

Unmistakably there is a charm that cannot be found elsewhere in our big city. You see no grouches there. You see no sober-faced men or women. Instead you see happy sparkling eyes and hear the merry shouts of laughter throughout the whole night. So I am just going to dismiss it with the idea that it is the atmosphere of the Boulevard, conducive of enjoyment, and the reason for it is the democracy that prevails.

It was at the dinner hour when we arrived at Second avenue and Tenth street. The dining-rooms on the first floor were filled. The balcony had its full quota of diners. A table for two was found, and it was done with so much grace that you felt at home at once. You look about you. It is without question a cosmopolitan mixture, and there comes more of the charm. You recognize men who during business hours are stern visaged captains of finance, or lieutenants at least. All signs of care have disappeared from their brow. Brokers, business men, professional men and others are all grouped about the tables. Here you will see a successful playwright enjoying with his friends the fruits of fat royalties. A cartoonist of great renown is giving a party to some others of his brethren, some who have not yet "arrived." A successful author is heard extolling the virtues of his publishers.

In another room you see men and women of serious mien. You know them at once. They are the persons upon whose voluntary shoulders rest the fate of nations. They are going to solve every problem. But do they? No, the music strikes up and they are listening with rapt attention. And so on throughout the entire restaurant.

The orchestra is playing. The air is a Hungarian one. It is full of snap, dash and fire. Men snort, women throw their heads up defiantly. They know the meaning of the song. It is a challenge and has been impressed upon every Hungarian since his birth. Then a change comes. The orchestra is playing something dreamy. You can almost see the tears glisten in the eyes of the players. Hushed are the thousand throats in the place. Dreamily the violinists draw their bows with so much feeling across the strings.

"Ah, such music," breathes a neighbor, and I see tears trickling down his cheeks. "The gypsy bands in Budapest play those airs and it means so much to them that they cry while playing."

Then comes the transition again. A ragtime air is being rendered. The sentimental love song has been forgotten and the diners are following the words of the dainty little character singer who is impressing upon you that "up the river they row."

There is a lull. The music has ceased. But what is that we see! Waiters are passing from table to table and leaving at each a handful of bright-colored celluloid balls. What are they for? The answer comes with a stinging shock on the head. A woman who has disproved the saying a woman can't throw straight, has struck me with one of the balls. It doesn't hurt. I never saw her before but I throw one of my celluloid balls back at her. Shouts of laughter accompany each loss. I afterwards learn that the man with the woman was her husband. I met her on the street afterwards, but she did not seem to have ever seen me. It was all in the night at the Boulevard. Restraint was laid aside. You did not stand on ceremony. You went to have a good time and so did everybody else and they had it. The air is full of balls. Men and women are standing up and pelting each other. All are children again. I looked in the balcony and saw the head of one of the biggest banking houses in the United States pelting a girl who was not of Fifth avenue society, but for the once all were on equal footing.

The cabaret has begun. Excellent artists are affording us entertainment now. Singers render solos and duets and you are carried from the realms of grand opera to those of ragtime in a swift transition that leaves you no time to wonder which you like the best. Then come the dancers. Smiling sweetly, and the essence of gracefulness, comes dainty, cute Effie Weston. She is dressed in pink and looks like a doll. My how she kicks her legs, pivots and does wonderful things in a solo dance. The applause (we joining in, you may be sure) is deafening. Out of breath she smiles and looks at the orchestra. The stirring music of the Texas Tommy is played. Like a shot she dashes from her chair. From another direction comes her brother, Bert, and they do a thrilling dance. The people are insistent for more and they good-naturedly grant it. During the evening Miss Weston, who is going to be a big sensation before many more weeks, and who has already turned down an offer to go to London in the American Review playing at the Alhambra, does another solo dance to the tune of A La Parissiene, which is most graciously received.

Later on we see Bert and Effie Weston in a fascinating waltz to the tune of Waltz de Amour. They certainly are a very lively and nimble pair. Yes, they are brother and sister, and you can see that they enjoy dancing together. They turkey trot, tango, waltz and Texas Tommy in a way that is original as well as sensational. The grace with which this young couple dance only comes after years of hard work, which they acquired in musical comedies. All we can say is that they are an excellent team.

We are going, "Ah, but we have dancing upstairs," says the captain with an air that is full of promise. We go upstairs and are ushered into another atmosphere. The large banquet hall has been given over for the pleasure of those who wish to turkey trot. A negro orchestra is thrumming one of those airs that is irresistible. Many of the tables are deserted, for the occupants who can dance cannot withstand this appeal. Bert and Effie have just come upstairs after finishing their waltz, and are ushered to a table where some friends have been waiting for them. Bert asks one of the young ladies of the party, if she won't turkey trot, and away they go. Maybe this young fellow can't dance. Well, just ask the girls. He makes them do all kinds of fancy steps in a very simple manner.

You see Miss Effie and wonder if you dare ask such a perfect dancing machine to try to go through the mazes of a trot with you. Some guest wants to dance with Miss Weston, an introduction is arranged. It is done with dignity, and in a hurry they go trotting off together. Then you seek an introduction to Bert Weston who is most gracious. Bert has picked out a woman who is longingly looking at the other dancers. She gazes wistfully about as if wondering which of the young men she sees at the different tables would make a suitable partner. Her body sways with the music. But her husband is unable to help her out.

Bert comes to the rescue and she has a delightful dance. And this is the way it goes all the night.

We do dips, we do fancy steps that Miss Effie teaches us. We watch women no longer young try to do the steps that Bert shows them. We see amateurs doing wonderful feats. Everything goes, so long as you remember that you are a lady or a gentleman.

And when every one is anxious for a rest Bert and Effie give exhibition of beautiful dances. And so it continues all night until way into the morning for some.

But they are young and can stand it. We who are getting past twenty-five find 2 a. m. is the hour for departure, and we go and we talk about it all the way home, and we vow we will make it a point to go again and at once.

JEFF OSBOURNE BACK TO WORK

Jefferson Osbourne, who was so seriously burned in the St. George Hotel fire, has returned to work and was the recipient of a welcome which must have warmed his heart and which surely helped to compensate for some of the suffering which he has gone through. Jeff is thin and not over strong, yet he looks well and is thankful for the fact that his face is almost unmarked, although he will bear the marks of the fire all his life on his body, his neck and his hands and arms. Jeff is with Milton H. Fahrney's sompany as of yore, and with the return of himself, Jack Conway and Louis Fitsroy, the Fahrney stage looks like old times. Jack Conway has had a good long rest and looks well and fit. All of them are enthusiastic over the scenery and facilities at the Ranch.

The National has the largest seating capacity of any theatre in Boston. Even during the Lenten season we played to capacity business, and we will give full credit to the Kinetophone for it. —George A. Haley, National Theatre, Boston.

The Kinetophone has run perfect at every performance and we are doing the biggest business in the history of the theatre. —J. H. Moore, Temple Theatre, Detroit.

WHAT THE PAPERS SAY

The wonder of the thing was uppermost. For the greater part of the exhibition the audience sat almost spellbound, then they applauded for nearly ten minutes.—New York Evening World.

At the matinee the Colonial Theatre was crowded and the talking pictures proved one of the biggest acts ever presented in vaudeville.—New York Evening Journal.

For the first five minutes the audience sat as if entranced, then, as if in answer to a signal, the applause broke out in deafening volume and continued for several minutes.—Chicago Examiner.

At the National Theatre several thousand persons heard for the first time figures in a moving picture talk and sing. It was evident that they fully appreciated the vast possibilities of this wonderful invention, for again and again a storm of applause surged back through the audience.—Boston Journal.

Edison's Kinetophone is surely a twentieth century sensation and this week proved to be the strongest box office attraction vaudeville has ever had in Rochester.—Rochester (N. Y.) Times.

The first Buffalo view of the Kinetophone was given at Shea's. It seems beyond belief, but the beginning is just in sight. We are making history every day and the Kinetophone will give future generations the complete story in every detail.—Buffalo Express.

The Kinetophone proved to be the greatest attraction on the bill and is undoubtedly destined to revolutionize the moving picture business.—Cleveland (O.) Leader.

Edison, the wizard, has effected a wonderful combination of his two great inventions—the phonograph and the motion picture—and the result is an almost uncanny reproduction of life itself.—Baltimore (Md.) News.

The Kinetophone is unquestionably a remarkable invention. The synchronization of sound and action has at last been successfully accomplished.—Philadelphia North American.

EX-CATHEDRA

THE S. P. C. C. AND THE MOTION PICTURE THEATRE

EVERY now and again the cry goes up that the moving picture theatre is immoral; that, from the audience of children who may visit, there is recruited the vice squad; that the boys and girls in a theatre are not safe, and that the moving picture theatre is responsible for all the increase of badness and depravity in the city. From the manager of the Literary Bureau of the New York S. P. C. C. I received the following communication:

> Because of the increasing number of offenses against the morals of children, committed in and through moving picture resorts, the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is advocating an amendment to the Greater New York charter, seeking to place the moving picture shows under the same rules and regulations as first-class theatres. There are over 800 moving picture places in New York City. Most of these are located in tenement districts, in what were formerly small stores. The danger from panic or fire is so great that the life of no one is safe in them.
> But aside from this and aside from the character of the pictures shown, the S. P. C. C. finds cause for greater complaint in the number of boys and girls who are led to moral destruction in these crowded and darkened rooms.
> President Lindsay, of the society, made the following statement:
> "The depravity of children in Greater New York since the introduction of the moving picture industry has increased to such an alarming extent that this society, after several years' study and consideration of the subject, has proposed the amendments to the Greater New York charter set forth in Mr. Cuvillier's bill (1708), placing kinetoscope and moving picture shows under the same requirements and regulations as first-class theatres, until the Board of Aldermen shall have passed some appropriate ordinances on the subject.
> "The enactment of this measure will at once wipe out many of the small and particularly objectionable places which at present are licensed as 'common shows' and pay a yearly fee of only $25. Degenerates have found these moving picture resorts the easiest means of making the acquaintance of children, and numerous unspeakably vile crimes against both boys and girls have resulted. During the past five years one hundred and fourteen cases of sodomy, rape, abduction and indecent assault against children, directly traceable to associations thus formed, have been prosecuted by this society in the courts.
> "This society protests against the many opportunities which these resorts afford for the moral destruction of boys and girls. The enactment of Mr. Cuvillier's bill is distinctly in the interests of the children of the community.
> "Every clergyman of every denomination should make it his personal business to communicate with the member of the Assembly from his district, urging the passage of this important measure at the present session of the Legislature."

After reading the above, I want to ask, where have these people been so long? In the backwoods, or in the seclusion of their private office? The above statement is going the rounds of the press, and is the most garbled, illogical and highly colored press screed it is possible for the imagination of a writer to conceive. Such conditions never have existed, nor do they now exist. One or two instances have come to light, but out of the thousands upon thousands who visit these small theatres nightly it is impossible to find the smallest fractional per cent of such a garbled statement as the above statistics show; the danger is infinitesimal. As far as the panic of fire is concerned, I gave the figures in my last week's editorial, and would call the attention of the manager of the Literary Bureau to those figures and ask him how he can consistently, in view of these figures, make such garbled statements as the press notice he is sending out? I would also like to ask, how is it possible, under the present ordinance of the city, for a child to get into a theatre unaccompanied by a parent or an adult, and I want proof, absolute proof, and nothing but proof, that the depravity of children in Greater New York since the introduction of the moving picture industry has increased to any alarming extent.

Again, I would like to ask, what right has the S. P. C. C. to wipe out many of the small places which are at present licensed as common shows paying a yearly fee of $25? The Mayor, the Fire Commissioners, the License Bureau have all been to these places, and if they are so bad as is described in the above garbled statement, why do not the authorities responsible wipe them out of existence? I acknowledge there are a few in dark places that it would be well to close. Even taking, during the past five years, 114 cases (I admit at once it is a pity that such cases have existed), this gives a fraction less than twenty-three per year, and if we take the lowest estimate of people visiting the theatres (which has been approximated at 500,000 daily), reckoning this for the year, what a merely infinitesimal percentage does twenty-three in a year give, and all the four counts must be taken into consideration, which will give five per year to each, and I think, personally, the S. P. C. C. would be doing better work in looking after more flagrant cases of cruelty than these they mention in their press notice.

I have visited many of the theatres in the lowest parts of New York as well as the highest, and have not found anything mentioned that would necessitate such a bill or bills as this Society wants enacted. If the Bureau will give me the figures, the dates, and the places with the names of the managers of the houses where such things are existing, I will personally pillory and see that their license is cancelled. The S. P. C. C. has the power, if they can get the information, and the evidence, of clearing out the special places which they mention, but out of 800 and over of moving picture theatres only twenty-three in the course of the year have done any wrong. Must the remaining 800-odd suffer for the sins of these few? Surely, in this enlightened twentieth century we do not want to go back to the Puritanical days of the Blue Laws.

Ladies and gentlemen of the S. P. C. C., surely you have a greater work to do than this of trying to find a needle in a bushel of hay; you are doing a grand work; you are doing a noble work, and this that you are trying to do, by the above publicity, is so far beneath you that you ought to be ashamed of yourselves trying to influence public opinion concerning that of which you know absolutely nothing. If your inspector, or inspectors, will go with me from the Battery to the Bronx, from the Bronx to Harlem, from Harlem again to the Battery, and if he can find one single case which he refers to in circular I will do everything that one man can do to shut up the show in which it is found. As no one but children over sixteen years are allowed to visit these places, the perversity must be found in the home training, and not in the moving picture theatre.

Alfred H. Saunders.

PRESIDENT NEFF IS LOUD IN PRAISE OF PICTURE SHOWS

M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, arrived in Birmingham March 23rd to attend the sessions of the Alabama Motion Picture Exhibitors' League at their annual convention.

President Neff was shown about the city by A. A. Wall, vice-president of the Alabama association, and looked over the various moving picture theatres of Birmingham, which pleased him very much in their up-to-date and fireproof features.

Mr. Neff, however, showed surprise that the theatres in Birmingham should be closed on Sunday, when they are open in every other progressive city in the United States, including Montgomery and Mobile. He said:

"This is my first visit to Birmingham, and from what I've seen of your city it impresses me very much. Its future is assured through its great natural resources and undoubtedly Birmingham will be one of the great metropolises of the country in a few years. In my duties as president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League I have to visit every city and town of any importance in the United States and Canada, and I assure you none have ever impressed me with their general progressive spirit as Birmingham has in the short time I've been here.

"As to moving pictures, all I can say is what everyone knows, that it is the greatest business in the world today; the greatest educational force, the greatest force for the establishment of needed reforms. In fact, I might state without successful contradiction that moving pictures are the greatest force for moral uplift and education in the world.

"Let us see what moving pictures have done. For instance, who ever dreamed two years ago that China, then an absolute monarchy, full of the cruelest kind of despotism, would become a republic as it is to-day. No one then dreamed of such a possibility, but that supposed impossibility has been wrought, and what brought it about? Moving pictures is the answer.

"All the prayers and the teachings and books of the missionaries were very good things for the heathen Chinee, but he did not pay much attention to them. When the moving picture arrived in China and pictures with readers in his own language were shown to him his eyes opened and his interest was awakened. On the screen millions of Chinamen were able for a small coin to see the progress of the Western world; the skyscrapers of New York, the immense factories and mills of this country, the architectural beauties of Europe, the ways of educated white people. All of these things sunk into the Chinaman's mind to a much greater depth than the teachings and books of the missionaries, and the revolution which resulted in unseating the Empress Dowager and putting that progressive Chinaman, Yuan Shi Kai, in as president is directly traceable to the influence of the moving pictures. Moving picture men the world over should feel proud that to them belongs much of the credit for this great reform.

"Where is the dime and nickel thriller that was so popular ten years ago? In the courts of bankruptcy. No publishing firm which publishes only 'thrillers' of the 'Dead Eye Dick,'

ACROSS THE BORDER
Pilot release April 10th.

THE STRONGER CALL
Reliance release April 9th.

'Shoot 'Em, Jack,' and the silly romantic novels can survive in competition with moving pictures, and out of over 150 of these fiery publications of the nickel and dime variety only eight now remain in operation, and this number will be reduced to seven in a few weeks, as another is about to suspend. The small boy or young girl is not spending his or her nickel and dime for a book on killing Indians and the lovers of the washerwoman, when they can see a much better show than any book can furnish in moving pictures for the same money.

"Here is something else that moving pictures are directly responsible for. The consumption of whisky and beer in the United States since moving pictures has come in vogue has fallen off 32 per cent. Criminal statistics throughout the country have fallen off 28 per cent, and it is claimed and well supported that cigarette smoking has been greatly reduced owing to their influence. Where is the individual that can contend with these statistics and state that moving pictures are harmful to the youthful mind and are immoral? Where is the individual that will contend that moving pictures are not the greatest educational force the world over? There are none.

"And the moving picture men are not resting on their oars because of their success, but are daily contriving and striving to better the films, to provide greater amusement and intelligence to the public.

"Now, to-day is Sunday, and in walking about your city I saw thousands of pedestrians of both sexes wandering about aimlessly and with apparently nowhere to go. Such is not the case in many other large cities in the country, for in those cities the city government in a progressive, get-together spirit, has arrived at the conclusion that moving pictures are the best prevention of evil. And it is to be hoped that the city government of Birmingham and its pastors will soon arrive at the same conclusion and thereby greatly decrease a lot of police court business of Monday mornings.

"There is something everyone must have: Food, drink and amusement, and if we deprive the public of Birmingham of innocent amusement on Sunday it will go and amuse itself in various other ways more or less harmful and oftentimes without the sanction of any laws."

SIDNEY B, BLAKELY

We take pleasure in reproducing a recent photograph of Mr. Sidney B. Blakely, one of the Motiograph demonstrators, who will leave the factory of The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co. in Chicago the first of April, on a trip to take him through the Central Western States, South into Texas and other points in the South and Southwest. Mr. Blakely has been connected with the moving picture industry as operator, manager and traveling demonstrator for the past seven years, and in 1910 was in England as demonstrator for the Walterdaw Company, European agent for the Powers Cameragraph, and after terminating his connection with them he returned to this country and Chicago and became chief operator of the Kedzie Amusement Company, operating the Kedzie Theatre and Kedzie Annex, said to be one of the most complete and up-to-date moving picture theatres in this country. Mr. Blakely is a Motiograph enthusiast, and in the handling of the Motiograph machines for the Kedzie Amusement Company was on many occasions highly complimented on the excellent projection of the pictures shown. Mr. Blakely will visit all towns of 10,000 inhabitants and over, and will remain several days in each of the large cities which he reaches en route, and among his duties will be the inspection and adjustment, in the booth, if possible, of all Motiograph machines now in use, and in addition he will carry a complete motor-driven Motiograph machine, which he will install and demonstrate through actual projection on the screen of any prospective purchaser.

P. W. RANDOLPH, who directed for the Universal in the Hawaiian Islands, and who has since been directing under the Nestor brand, is going to act from now on as assistant director to Francis Ford in the new series of Cuban and Philippine pictures. Ray Meyers, who has been assisting and acting with Francis Ford, is transferred to Director Jack O'Brien, with whom he takes leads. That capital actor, Alexander Gaden, joins Mr. Ford's forces, and will take leads and heavies with him.

Iowa Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

The Motion Picture Exhibitors League will hold a convention at Des Moines, Iowa, Tuesday and Wednesday, May 6th and 7th.

The headquarters will be at the Savery Hotel, where exhibits of various manufacturers will be shown.

Exhibitors and manufacturers are requested to communicate with Fred W. Young, secretary, 420 Clapp Building, regarding any arrangements they wish to make relative to the convention and space for exhibits.

The Burt Bill, known in the House of Representatives as No. 210, for an act to provide the regulation of moving picture films and establishing a state censor was defeated in the House of Representatives.

The Iowa Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, with the co-operation of the exchanges and its legal department, was successful in its work. Great credit should be given Fred W. Young, secretary of the League, for his untiring efforts the past three months watching the progress of the bill through the various committees and compiling statistics showing that a censorship was not needed in Iowa.

The Censorship Bill which was defeated was very unfair in that it left the censoring of films to one man with a salary of $2,500 and allowed $5,000 for office expenses and assistants.

This one man could tell three million people what they could see in the picture shows. A fee of $2.00 was to be paid for every reel censored. Had the manufacturers or film exchanges paid this fee, the exhibitor would have had to pay it in the end, in extra film rental, as exchanges would have had added expense by having to establish offices in Iowa and having all films sent in here for inspection.

National Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

Alabama State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America is making rapid progress since the election of the following officers who met in convention at the Hilman Hotel, Birmingham, March 24th: A. A. Wall, National Vice-President, Odeon Theatre, Birmingham; E. H. Colley, President, Vaudette, Birmingham; T. S. Abernathy, First Vice-President, Birmingham; A. F. Wilby, Second Vice-President, Academy of Music, Selma; J. G. Wells, Secretary, Anniston; J. A. Snider, Treasurer, Bessemer, Alabama.

From Birmingham President Neff went to New Orleans; the train being 3½ hours late, he did not arrive until 12:30. Shortly after his arrival at the Grunewaid Hotel he was met by W. H. Gueringer, Enterprise Theatre, New Orleans, accompanied by Albert H. Kaufmann, of New Orleans, of the Consolidated Film Company, and the special manager of the General Film Company. On Wednesday morning at 10 a. m. an open meeting was called to order by President Neff in the hall on the twelfth floor of the Grunewald Hotel. The meeting adjourned at 12:30 to meet again at 2 p. m. At 2 p. m. the meeting was called to order and exhibitors were asked to join the organization. Temporary officers were appointed by Mr. Neff and at five o'clock the convention adjourned to meet at the same place at 10 a. m. Thursday. When the roll was called Thursday, thirty-one exhibitors paid their initiation fee and became members of the organization and elected the following officers: John Depinet, National Vice-President, New Orleans; A. G. Gugel, President, Gretna; A. G. Shear, First Vice-President, New Orleans; H. C. Van Cott, Second Vice-President, Alexandria; F. H. Maybury, Secrtary, New Orleans; Sidney Levy, Treasurer, New Orleans; J. W. Russ, New Orleans, Sergeant-at-Arms. Delegates were elected to the third National Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America, which is to be held in New York City beginning July 7th to 12th. Delegates elected are as follows: Abraham Seligman, W. H. Gueringer, Theo. Racknagel, Albert Durning, Solomon Loeb, W. L. Jennings. Alternates: F. R. Feiderich, Jr., A. W. Waisdorf, H. Freidenberg. V. C. Howard, S. L. Bourke, M. B. Gill. One of the first acts of the New Orleans exhibitors after joining the league was to raise ninety-seven dollars ($97) to be sent to the flood sufferers of Ohio and Indiana.

Mr. Neff left New Orleans on Thursday evening for Gulfport, Miss., where he was met by a committee of Mississippi exhibitors, Fred Abbley, National Vice-President, acting as chairman. The Mississippi exhibitors met Friday morning March 28th, at 10 a. m. in Gulfport at the Great Southern Hotel, President Neff presiding. An open meeting was held in the forenoon; in the afternoon the organization was perfected with the election of the following officers: Fred Abbley, National Vice-President, Gulfport; H. H. Carleton, President, Jackson; B. A. Mulligan, First Vice-President, Vicksburg; C. H. Howell, Second Vice-President, Okolona; R. H. Redus, Secretary, West Point; G. W. Wilkes, Treasurer, Biloxi; S. L. Taylor, Sargeant-at-Arms, Pass Christian, Miss. On Friday evening F. H. Maybury, of New Orleans, talked to President Neff over the 'phone stating that the committee had secured eight members on Friday, and that everybody had gone to work with a will, and they expected to have 300 in the state of Louisiana within the next ninety days. President Neff left Gulfport Friday night, and by a circuituous route arrived in Cincinnati Sunday afternoon, March 30th.

Members of the Exhibitors League all over the United States and Canada are enthusiastically supporting April 8th, Exhibitors' Day. It is confidentially expected by the officers of each state and the national officers that Exhibitors' Day, through the efforts of all the members in contributing five per cent to their own states and five per cent to the National League, will place their own state and the national organization in splendid financial condition.

Moving Pictures of Mildred Zukor

Mildred Zukor, the charming young daughter of Adolph Zukor, the famous president of the equally famous Players Film Company, celebrated her thirteenth birthday on Sunday, March 30th, in a very unique manner, incidentally proving that she has inherited from her father a knowledge of the value of motion pictures. An elaborate reception was tendered little Miss Zukor and a number of her friends at the big studio of the Famous Players Film Company, and in order to perpetuate the event motion pictures were taken of the gathering.

This is probably the first time in the varied history of the motion picture that a birthday party was ever recorded in film, and it seems entirely logical that the innovation should be introduced to commemorate the birthday of the daughter of the man who first appreciated the enduring value of the film. The picture was elaborate enough to deserve being termed a young production, with sets of which the ordinary release would boast, and technically perfect even to the detail of subtitles. First was shown the entrance hall of the Zukor home, and the arrival of the guests, then the drawing-room, the family at home, the pretty home circle soon interrupted by the entrance of the young friends of Miss Zukor, thrilling with expectancy; a dance, at the termination of which the doors leading to the dining-room were opened, displaying the festive board so lavishly furnished with good things that for a moment the children forgot they were acting for the camera and abandoning pantomime, expressed their delight very much vocally. The picture wound up with the birthday party, and it must be said that the children's acting was best in this part. In the words of the critic, the picture was strikingly original, the photography perfect, and the acting unusually natural. When Miss Zukor emerges from her sweet childhood into a sweeter womanhood, these pictures should prove a happy possession.

MILDRED ZUKOR

The Moving Picture News joins in wishing the little lady lots and lots of other equally happy birthdays, with each year a greater number of friends than were present at her last, among whom were Eugene Zukor, her brother, Mrs. E. Kaufman, Frances Kaufman, Beulah Kohn, Mrs. M. Kohn, Mrs. E. E. Shauer, Mr. and Mrs. S. Weltner, Lillian Friedman, Ida Fogel, Richard Friedman, "Doll" Wells, Dave and Arthur Loew, and Joseph Hoffman.

THE REGENT THEATRE

Wending your way from Eighth avenue eastward on 116th street, a cheery electric sign signals you from the southwestward corner of 116th street and Seventh avenue. The sign spells REGENT in a myriad of small electric bulbs, and the word which it spells pertains to a moving picture theatre which opens cheerily to the public on the Seventh avenue side of the block.

This moving picture theatre, which has very excellent and entertaining accommodations, of which we will speak later, has something more than the ordinary amount of interest attached to the history of its origination in the fact that one of its originators was the late Mr. J. J. Little, of the well-known J. J. Little printing establishment, and that the primary motive for its origination was the elevation of the moving picture theatre and its entertainment.

Mr. Robert Warren was also an interested party in the erection of this theatre, which has a seating capacity of 1,800 people, and in the erection of which was expended many thousands of dollars. The work of financing the erection of the building fell largely, if not altogether, to the combined efforts of these two men.

The Regent theatre, which opened on February 8th, is an exemplification of refined taste in arrangement, decoration, and the general tone of the entertainment furnished therein.

It is built in the Spanish-Moorish style. The color scheme of the interior decorations is of gold, blue, and red, with satin wall panels, and heavy carpets of dark blue. Extending into the dome, above the proscenium arch, is a splendid mural painting by the celebrated Roumanian artist, Prince Jean Poleologue, and which is a copy of the famous "Surrender of Granada," by Francisco Pradillo.

Only the best class of music is heard from the eight-piece orchestra which supplies the orchestral portion of the program, directed by Conrad Koschat. Some excellent organ numbers are also given on the great $15,000 organ of the theatre by the former organist of Wanamaker's, Arthur Depew. Each day there is exhibited at the Regent theatre in an excellent program of Association films an educational subject, and in every respect this theatre's entertainment may be classed among the most refined and uplifting in New York City.

Mr. Talley is the General Manager of the theatre who gave the interviewer a hearty welcome.

WHEN THIEVES FALL OUT

(Gaumont 3-Reel Feature)

A splendid plot is laid through the interweavings of the story of "When Thieves Fall Out," full of interest, and carefully handled by producer and players. Though, strictly speaking, of the sensational sort, the story is not without its artistic element, a common attribute of all Gaumont productions.

The story of the play centers about the descendants of Count Philip de Croize, who on his death left a box of hidden treasure; so well hidden, in fact, that a century or more afterward it had not yet been found. The discovery, however, comes about through two delectable men, one of them the lawyer for the estate of the Countess de Croize, who agree to buy the Chateau of the Countess upon whom a foreclosure of a mortgage is pending, and finding the whereabouts of the treasure, divide equally of the spoil.

A female friend of the lawyer, whose extravagances have been the indirect cause of his entering into the disgraceful compact, figures again near the close of the story when conniver No. 2 kills his confederate, and the woman in question entraps the sweetheart of the young daughter of the de Croize household.

The usual unraveling of the tangled thread ensues, and all ends happily.

THE EVENTFUL CAREER OF LOTTIE BRISCOE, LEADING WOMAN WITH LUBIN COMPANY

We stood at the partly open door leading to a suite, in one of the most sumptuous of Philadelphia's hostelries, awaiting an invitation to enter.

The strains of a Chopin polonaise, played with wonderful technique and expression, issued from the apartment. The brilliancy of its coloring was accentuated with such accuracy and precision, that it "cameoed," so to speak, like a sharp stereoscopic picture on the screen.

The player ceased, there was a pause, and a rich contralto voice invited us to enter.

Seated at the piano was Lottie Briscoe, the gifted and accomplished leading woman of the Lubin forces.

We regarded her with amazement for a second, then recovering from our surprise we asked:

"Was it you we heard playing?"

To which she ingenuously replied:

"Yes! Is it so remarkable?"

"Indeed it is! For your technique is that of a master; we were wondering who taught you."

"I was never taught. Music just comes to me. I've never had a lesson in my life."

And turning to the instrument in a listless sort of manner, she wandered from Rubinstein's Melody in F to Schumann's Concerto, and finished with Paderewski's Nocturne.

Miss Briscoe is one of the few accessories from the ranks of the legitimate stage to the Cinematography industry who has a really just claim to histrionic training. In her infancy she displayed talent of such marvelous diversity it seemed akin to true genius, for she is not the product of stage parents, nor were her ancestors in any way allied with the stage or its people.

A wonderfully keen perception, combined with a faculty for imitation, developed in her when she could scarcely walk.

At the tender age of four, in company with her mother, she attended a matinee performance at the Grand Opera House in St. Louis, then managed by the late John W. Norton. The play was "Romeo and Juliet," and Margaret Mather was the star.

All through the performance the child sat in wrapt attention, as trancelike she appeared to be absorbing every word. At the finish her mother stopped for a moment to converse with some friends in the lobby, and as she turned to go, Lottie was nowhere to befound. Greatly agitated the mother began an excited search for the missing child.

After an interim of painful suspense, she heard loud laughter issuing from the box-office, intermingled with the voice of a child. She rushed frantically to the window, looked in, and beheld her precocious offspring bowing her acknowledgments to the plaudits of Manager Norton, George Macmanus, William Marian Reedy, and other well-known people of the journalistic and theatrical profession, who happened to be present.

Lottie had just finished the "potion scene" from "Romeo and Juliet" in imitation of Miss Mather.

The incident created such a profound impression that the local journals devoted columns of space to the infant prodigy, and offers poured in upon the parents from managers throughout the country, all of which were rejected.

Shortly after the family changed their place of residence to Cincinnati, and it was here Miss Briscoe made her first professional appearance.

away Wife," featuring Eda Clayton, an emotional actress of note were filling an engagement at the principal playhouse. The youthful actress cast for the imporant part of Arthur, the son of the hero, was stricken with sudden illness, and the management were at their wits end to find a substitute. By some lucky chance, little Lottie's name was mentioned, and a messenger dispatched in search of her. It was quite late in the afternoon, and fears were entertained that the night's performance, would have to be abandoned, when, attended by her mother, Lottie appeared at the theatre. She was taken in charge by Miss Clayton, who at once began to instruct her in the lines and business of the part. The task proved an easy one, except for a spirit of self-assertiveness on the part of the debutante, who after being rehearsed several times finally remarked:

"There! I think that will do! I'll be all right to-night!"

And she was, for her performance was a revelation.

Arrangements were perfected by which she continued with the company for the remainder of the season, which brought the family to New York. Little Lottie's fame had preceded her, and the parents were fairly deluged with offers for her services.

It was in later years while being featured in the "Burglar," she attracted the attention of the late Richard Mansfield, who engaged her at a large salary, and employed the services of her mother as chaperone. During the several seasons she remained with Mr. Mansfield's Company she played the "Prince of Wales" in "Richard III," "Essie," in "Devil's Disciple," an important part in "First Violin." A special engagement, under the management of A. M. Palmer, in an important part in "That Man." Ora, the leading part in "Lost River;" Julian Esmond in "Fair Virginia," Claude in "Two Little Vagrants," ingenue lead in "Friend from India," are but a few of the special engagements Miss Briscoe played before she turned her attention to stock work, in which she endeared herself to the theatregoing public in many cities, notably, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago and Columbus, Ohio.

With large expressive eyes, and a face of wonderful mobility, fairly speaking the various emotions, she finally attracted the attention of the motion picture magnates, who pursued her with flattering offers, until at last she succumbed to that great representation in the world of Cinematography, Sigmund Lubin, where for the past eighteen months she has been recognized as Arthur Johnson's leading woman.

FLOOD VICTIMS

A monster benefit for the flood sufferers will be given by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of New York at the Sixty-ninth Armory, Lexington avenue and Twenty-sixth street (who donated their hall for this purpose). The entertainment will be held on Saturday evening, April 12th, and will comprise moving pictures with the presence of all the principal actors and actresses of the various companies in New York. Wm. Fox Co. have consented to allow some of their vaudeville stars to be present, and Marcus Loew also donates some of the talent that he controls.

Mayor Gaynor will make the opening address in person. Kalem Company have donated the sum of $100, and will have Miss Alice Joyce and Tom Moore, who will be in the lobby and will have photographs of themselves with their written autograph on each picture. Other actors and actresses may do the same to help swell the funds. The various stars will also be in the lobby with buttonhole flowers for the gathering.

Mr. M. Needle is acting chairman for this occasion. Doors will be open at 7 o'clock. Entertainment will commence at 8 o'clock sharp. Admission will be 50 cents each person, box seats $1.00. There is seating accommodation for 7,000 people, and we sincerely hope the Armory will be crowded with those interested in the moving picture industry with their friends to help swell the fund being raised on behalf of the flood sufferers.

SYDNEY ASCHER has leased the roof of the National Theatre at Houston Street and Second Avenue, and which will be known as the National Winter Garden.

AL. W. FILSON, one of the character actors with the Selig Pacific Coast forces, is a unique example of the fascination which photoplay work holds for the best class of stage people. Mr. Filson, who is fairly well advanced in years, is a man who doesn't have to work for a living, not by a long way! He just loves the picture game, that's all. He owns one of the finest orange groves in Southern California, holds control of four producing oil wells, and has fattened his purse through deals in fancy real estate. Mr. Filson left the stage, where he and his wife had been famous for years, to go into business, and he was successful in a large way. But the lure of moving pictures proved irresistible to him, and he has yielded to the work heart and soul. The little frost which hit California orange groves this winter cost Filson about $10,000. But that paltry sum wasn't enough to feaze him in the least. How many moving picture actors could stand that pressure, and still have money to spend? Mr. Filson appears in the role of old Col. Haskins, in Selig's latest animal feature, "A Wise Old Elephant."

Screen Club Damaged by Fire

A fire which literally gutted the hair goods store at 45th street and Broadway on Monday night of this week did considerable damage to the properties of the Screen Club, which is situated directly above it. The records of the club and other valuable assets were rescued by members of the club who happened to be present. The damage, which will not exceed $1,000, is covered by insurance.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

"Blood and Thunder"

THE day of the "blood and thunder" moving picture script has passed. The sheriffs, cowboys, Mexicans. and the "chases" no longer evoke breathless interest on this side of the Atlantic. Several manufacturers have seemingly not discovered this fact as yet—but they will. The "saw-mill melodrama" is also hoary-headed, and, before many months, there will be a new deal all around. There will have to be if every film maker wishes to keep the pace that has recently been set by the leaders.

"The requirements of our studios are more strict than even a year ago," asserted a leading script editor recently. All plots must be strictly original, unusual and devoid of lurid sensationalism. Many of the literary stars are turning to the work. There is a scarcity of real good plots. Four or five years ago the "chase" picture, and the story of the elderly gentleman issuing forth to a series of more or less comical mishaps were apropos. Audiences tired of them and are disgusted to-day with the exaggerated melodrama and the impossible cowboy. We appreciate this fact and are looking for those writers who can furnish us with the convincing story of the every-day people. There continues to be a scarcity of convincing comedy and all the old ideas have been twisted and turned time and time again."

When the writer of fiction approaches the work of script writing with careful study (and some are doing it) there will be new blood injected into the game, and it is something essential. The former picture scenario stars seem to have been written out. Their work has assumed a distressing sameness to the close student and a new deal is something devoutly to be wished. Notwithstanding the fact that the experienced writers are drawing numerous rejection slips these days, the correspondence schools are flourishing; bureaus of criticism are being operated; and textbooks published, all with the view to aid the ambitious writer along the difficult literary pathway.

Half-Reel Scripts

The split-reel stories are in demand. When you are trying to stretch a story into one thousand feet of action, stop and ponder a moment. A padded story stands small chance of sale while a good split-reel story stands every chance to market. Are you trying to stretch half-reel stories into full length scripts? Don't do it.

His New Address

Mr. C. B. Hoadley and family are now nicely domiciled at 151 West 103rd street, New York City. His clients should send their scripts to that address.

Kind Words Help Some

Although we have been in the writing game for twenty years, we were always appreciative of kind words. When our friends are doing good copy, we like to tell them so, it helps no matter how old a stager one may be. The other day we wrote a line to a lady whose literary work we admire very much. She has a lot of stuff published and knows the game, but our tribute unconsciously was opportune. She replied: "I cannot tell you what pleasure it gave me to receive your kind and encouraging letter. The words of appreciation which it contained were real inspiration. Sometimes I hate myself because my work appears to my tired eyes and brain so bad, but then someone who knows throws in a grain of encouragement, the muse seems to take on new life and color and the machinery moves along again with fresh energy and impetus. My work has really seemed easier since your letter came. I was feeling blue, and things were going wrong, and the reading of those cheery words was like a burst of sunshine on a cloudy day." Kind words help some, and it is just as easy to scatter some seeds in the joy-of-living garden occasionally as it is to sow the tares and the thistles of spitefulness and turmoil. We would like all our friends to remain out in the sunshine.

Safety Fairy Tales

In the cause of the newer education "Safety Fairy Tales" are being distributed in the public schools. Instead of the series of cowboys and "criminals of the higher classes" now being screened why cannot some manufacturer film a series from Grimm's Fairy Tales? Hans Christian Andersen's stories would also contribute to the series. Here is a hint to some advanced script writer.

American Humor

One of the finest things in American literature and on the American stage is American humor. Regretfully, we must state, that with few exceptions the American humor depicted on the picture screen is a delusion and a snare. American humor, real humor, is absolutely different in character from the humor of any other nation, and these allegedly humorous films of foreign make are not understandable to the average American audience. Absolutely original, absolutely different in character, brighter, fresher, keener, American humor is one of our most valuable possessions. And nowhere would it have greater value than on the moving picture screen. It is hoped the foreign style of humor will no longer infect our native playwrights. Many fine things we can borrow from England, France and Italy, but not their humor. Let us have more strictly American humor in the picture theatres.

The Selig Policy

The Selig Polyscope Company, in returning scripts, presents a new editorial policy which is one of the advanced signs of the times. Selig will not consider manuscripts containing any of the following incidents or characters: Theft, kidnapping, smuggling, murder, forgery, lewd women, drunks, "and other types or actions not consistent with upbuilding of the motion picture business."

American Humor

A Chicago short-story writer, who is achieving success with scripts, writes in: "A woman whom I had met casually heard in some way that I was writing picture plays. She sent me six scripts. She wrote that 'everybody was writing plays' and as she had all day upon her hands she might as well write, too. She said she knew I was able to rewrite hers, if they needed it, and 'that I could take out ten per cent after I sold them.' The scripts were impossible, and I returned them. I have lost a friend who thought I might be useful."

This sort of thing is becoming a great annoyance to certain writers. We never spent a cent in our early days to have scripts criticised, preferring to work out our own salvation. However, if you want your work revised or criticised send scripts to some clearing house, or expert, and do not annoy your friends.

Only Work, That's All

Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice, the well-known writer of fiction, doesn't see any light ahead—only work. Neither do we, Miss Justice! Miss Justice has considered script writing of enough importance to study its details and work for success therein, notwithstanding that she has orders in advance for all the literary work she can turn out for the Red Book, Munsey publications, Cosmopolitan, etc. Regardless of the fact that her literary agents keep at her to drop all script writing, she refuses and proposes to enjoy the fascinations of the game along with her other literary work. Miss Justice's Selig comedy, "The College Chaperon," is making a big hit, by the way. "I think that three or four really worth while scripts that will bring from $50 to $75 apiece amount to more in the end than many out begging for lesser prices," writes Miss Justice. "I think $25 is a usual price for the average script, and those who keep scripts out and going like whirlwinds sometimes make a mistake, for haste makes waste. I advised a friend of mine to stop the promiscuous sending out and he has sold four scripts in five weeks by following my plan."

There is something in Miss Justice's method of work. The man who can drop into his easy-chair any morning in the week and work with scripts is in an entirely different class from those who, perhaps, have a day's work to perform, and can only devote evenings and Sundays to literary work. It is nice, of course, to have a large number of scripts going the rounds. It is still nicer if each and every one of these scripts contain only the very best thought and work of the author. We know one writer who turns out four scripts monthly. His work is in demand and his lowest price is $50. We know another writer who is glad to get $25 for a script, but he writes one every other day. And then we know another man who had written forty-six scripts in the past two months and sold all but ten.

The Very Latest One

The very latest school fraud is the plan by which the victim receives, first, a letter from a "graduate" of a Chicago school in which he is told that the "graduate" is so delighted with the fruits of his study that he just cannot help informing his "brother writers" of the good thing. A week later the school literature is sent along. This recalls the halcyon days of the "green goods" letter.

It Is Far Better

Mr. Steve Twinkl, of Clear Lake, Wash., has found from experience that genius is the art of taking pains. He recommends a system that we have advocated for many months, but right now is a good time to pass it along once more to those who have not heeded. Mr. Twinkl writes:

> You will not find any "knocks" in this outburst of mine, but something that may be of interest to the readers who endeavor to write picture plays. Those who have their MSS. returned to them branded as to conventionality, insufficient action, or plot not strong enough, would do well to try this plan. Instead of sending your script to the editor as soon as you have finished it, put it aside for a week, then go over it and endeavor to improve upon it, make what changes you think best, then put is aside again for another week and try again to improve upon it. This may seem like misdirected energy, or waste of time, but one trial will convince you, I am sure, of its merit. In the excitement of the first writing of a story it is very easy to make weak points in it, and when you re-read it after completing it it undoubtedly seems to be all to the good, but after you have put it aside for a week and your first flush of inspiration has cooled a little, you can find more weak spots in it than strong ones. You will also find many places where more action can be used in the scenes, or the plot made stronger. It is far better to spend two or three weeks trying to improve a script than to have that much or more time lost in useless mailing from one film company to another.

Little Drops of Water

Little drops of water and little grains of sand—you remember the verse. Little details also make the mighty picture play. Watch the little things and do not persist in casting your lot in a $100,000 environment like several would-be writers we know of. Write the simple stories and then the manufacturers can afford to produce them.

Pertinent Pointers

Send good Western comedies and dramas to American at present.

The average editor can tell at a glance whether a script is worthy of reading.

Make your synopsis appeal to editor and director and your story stands a better chance of acceptance.

Writing scripts is serious work and should not be considered as a "side line."

If you can write what is called a "working script" then you have become a member of the inner circle.

Do not evolve unnecessary situations, stick to your story and do not wander.

Have a logical reason for every bit of action in your script. Do not write unnecessary detail.

Make your stories timely and be guided by the policies and desires of the various manufacturers.

Do not read a copyrighted story in an old magazine you find in the garret and then rewrite the story into a picture play, for some editorial reader will catch you as sure as fate.

If you can give a new turn to an old idea or let the unexpected happen, you may expect a check sooner or later.

Never let a scene weaken in the middle. Put bounce and nerve into your stories.

People tire of one kind of kitchen or one kind of action. Put versatility into your work.

Something of Interest

It will be of interest to many writers to know that the Gaumont Company do not purchase scripts. Announcements have been made, but the new recruits to the army of script writers are unacquainted with the fact. The easiest way for these writers to make money is to not waste stamps in sending their scripts to Flushing.

The Chicago Manufacturers

Mr. Arthur Leeds has an interesting article in The Photoplay Author of current issue under the above caption. We quote: "Among the members of the Essanay Stock Company are numbers of successful script writers. . . . If a writer cannot produce an unusual story he should not submit to Essanay, for there isn't one of their producers who cannot sit down and write a good story himself—if he has to. Mrs. Luella Parsons has charge of the incoming Essanay scripts, and if you can turn out real comedies you stand a chance of a market here. Good comedies, strong society dramas and unusual Westerns are wanted by Selig."

We would add to the above that Selig and Essanay editors are not advertising for scripts and only the experienced writers with the unusual plot stand much chance with these concerns.

ALFRED GOSDEN—While taking pictures of the Piegan Indians in the Glacier National Park, the Kinemacolor cameraman was initiated into the tribe, under the name of Kioystow, or Bear Knife. His tribal father, White Calf, and his sponsors, Three Bears and Medicine Owl, are among the Piegan delegates to the Travel Show, where their Kinemacolored "brother" took great pleasure in showing them their true likenesses on the screen. Mr. Tatsey, the interpreter, is still busy translating their comments and exclamations of amazement and delight into adequate English; but meanwhile they have promoted Mr. Gosden to the rank of pictorial Medicine Man.

MILTON H. FAHRNEY has been added as Director to the Bison forces. He has been connected with the Nestor Company since its inception, and starts his new job with a two-reel feature Civil War story, employing the actors and actresses who have been with him so long. Mr. Fahrney has been at work on the new story for some time, but deferred its presentation until he had secured all of the correct costumes and details for its production.

A STUDY IN SOCIOLOGY

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Majestic Release)

THE thing that worried old Mr. Alderson was not his millions but the effect they might have upon the future of his only daughter Helen.

He knew that his days were very few, and he greatly feared that as soon as he was gone Helen would be besieged by fortune-hunters. Many a sleepless night the old man spent trying to find a solution to his problem. He solved it the best he could, as was shown when his will was read.

To his daughter the old millionaire left his entire fortune if—and the if was very large—if she married a man of prominence and good repute or if she remained single. But in case she married a man who did not fill the requirements, the fortune went to the other natural heirs.

These heirs consisted of an aunt and some cousins of Mr. Alderson. Among the cousins was a man of fifty-five, well-read and polished, with a smile that made one wonder what he was concealing; the kind of man who would cause careful mothers to see that their daughters were out of the parlor before he called.

Helen had no careful mother. Furthermore, she had had no mother of any kind for a very long time. So, not being any more discerning than the average young woman, Helen sometimes confided her hopes and fears to Cousin Jack.

"I don't want to marry now," she said soon after her father's death, "but I might marry if I met the right man. I have plenty of time to find him though. Just now I am interested in sociology and such things. I wish I could do some real good in the world, Cousin Jack."

"Such a pretty girl as you are is doing good just by allowing herself to be looked at," answered the man.

"Oh, I don't want to be flattered in that silly way. When a girl thinks about and reads serious things she hasn't time for such foolishness.

What are you reading now?" asked Jack, taking a book from her hand.

"My Work Among the Workers," he read.

"Yes, it's by Parkman Dickerson," exclaimed the girl enthusiastically. "He must be a wonderful man."

Cousin Jack was silent for a moment. His scheming mind was very busy. Finally he said thoughtfully. "I might be able to introduce him to you. He belongs to my club but is very exclusive. Would you like it?"

"Oh, indeed I should. There are so many questions I should like to ask him."

"Well," continued the man, "suppose you dine with me the next ladies' day and I'll try to manage an introduction.

Helen was delighted. She spent most of her time reading Dickerson's books and making a list of questions she wanted to ask him.

The longed for day arrived and Helen, radiant with happy anticipation, entered the dining-room of the club.

"There he is," whispered Cousin Jack "Look in the glass just to your left and you can see him plainly."

Helen looked and her heart throbbed almost painfully.

"He is just going to order; shall I invite him to sit with us? I'll tell him you are interested in his work."

"Oh, do please, if it is all right," answered Helen with suppressed excitement.

In a few moments the three were seated at one table.

"It is splendid to see a young woman in your position so interested in social work," the newcomer was saying, and Helen began her questions.

When she reached home that night many things were going through her memory. Among the pieces of information she had gained were other things that made her smile shyly to herself now and then. Just before going to sleep she murmured to herself, "It is so splendid that a man can be doing serious work and still be just a man."

There were calls and drives in the park and theatres, coming rather quickly one upon the other, and then this man told Helen he had to go away for a while.

"I am going to say something to you now that I should otherwise have waited to say," he informed her. "I love you and want you to marry me and help me in my work. Will you?"

Helen's heart fluttered and for a moment she could not speak. This man thrilled her strangely—had done so from the very first, yet in the depths of her being she had a strange misgiving. However, being a girl without a mother and one who had never been in love she interpreted her feelings to be those of any normal girl under the same circumstances. Consequently, in a very short while a diamond ring was upon the proper finger.

"I must be well fitted to be his wife," she said to her cousin when her lover had gone away. "The best way is to do as he has done and be a worker among workers."

Cousin Jack thought it as well not to interfere, so the next day found Helen, plainly dressed, awaiting her turn in an employment office.

The result was the establishing of the girl as maid in the home of a Mrs. Travis.

Of course, Helen was thrown with the servants and a friendship soon sprang up between her and the chauffeur. He was a socialist like herself and each found the other very congenial.

From the other women servants Helen hears the gossip of the household. Young Travis is no good, drinks and gambles and carouses generally, they say. One evening Mrs. Travis' personal maid came to the servant's hall with a great story. The son had come home again and had asked his mother for money which she refused. There was a big fuss and the maid was looking for almost anything to happen.

The next morning when Helen was dusting the library young Travis entered. "Hello! Who's this?" he exclaimed upon seeing her.

"I am Mrs. Travis' parlor maid," answered Helen quietly.

"Well, you're a good-looker all right. Come, give me a kiss!"

Before Helen could leave the room he had seized her around the waist. She wrenched herself free and turning quickly gave the young man a stinging slap on the face.

"Damn you!" he muttered. "I'll get even with you," but the girl had fled from the room.

Straight to her room went Helen and began packing her suitcase. When she was about to leave her room and announce her departure to Mrs. Travis a knock sounded on her door. She opened it to find her mistress standing before her.

"Oh, I've caught you just in time. That is fortunate," said the lady with controlled anger.

"What do you mean, Mrs. Travis?" asked the bewildered Helen.

"You know well enough. My pearl necklace has gone very mysteriously and I come up here and find you with your hat on and your suitcase packed ready to leave. The affair is certainly very plain."

"You wrong me very greatly, Mrs. Travis," insisted Helen. "I am leaving because your son insulted me. I did not intend to tell you the reason but you compel me to. I was just coming to tell you I was leaving."

"Very likely. I shall call my son." She went to the end of the hall and called.

"Did you insult this girl?" she asked when he appeared.

"What are you talking about, mother? I never saw the girl before. Why do you ask me such insulting questions I'd like to know?"

"I believe she has taken my pearl necklace, dear, and I asked you that only because she gave it as an excuse for going. I knew it was not true."

"Have you searched her suitcase?"

"No, not yet."

"Well, that's the only thing to do. We'll probably find it all right."

Helen made no resistence and her suitcase was opened. The search failed to reveal the necklace, but another discovery was made.

"Look at this!" cried Mrs. Travis, "it is my diamond ring that I lost weeks ago. I thought it was before this girl came but I presume it was just after. What shall we do?"

"Mrs. Travis, you are greatly mistaken," Helen said earnestly. "That ring was given to me. It may be like yours but it can not be that one."

"Of course, she is going to deny it, mother. I'm going to call the police."

When the officer came he demanded the necklace from Helen. Of course, she could not produce it and the officer took her in charge.

Mrs. Travis and her son had to go to the police station to make the complaint against the girl, so the car was ordered to take them all.

"You have left the officer!" cried Mrs. Travis when the car started.

The chauffeur apparently did not hear.

"You are not going the right way, Richard," she called again. Again he did not seem to hear.

The car was headed for the country and the mother and son were pounding on the window and calling to the chauffeur to stop.

A light began to dawn upon Helen's mind and she sat perfectly quiet.

When the country roads were reached the car went faster and faster until finally it stopped suddenly.

The chauffeur got down from his seat and looked under the car.

"What do you mean?" cried the mother and son as they sprang from the car.

"I'm sorry, but I'm afraid we are stuck for a while," he answered pleasantly.

"What's the matter with you," raged Travis. "Why did you come out to this hole when I told you to go to the police station?"

"I'm sorry I misunderstood orders, sir. I'm afraid we'll have to stay here a while now." He could not entirely suppress a smile.

"You scoundrel!" yelled Travis, "like as not you're in this thieving business." He sprang at the chauffeur and in a moment they were fighting. The mother screamed and tried to separate them. Helen looked on quietly, wide-eyed and wondering.

Suddenly Travis' coat is torn open and the lost chain drops from his pocket. The mother sees it and springs forward, pouring down a torrent of words upon the bowed head of her son.

The chauffeur seized Helen's suitcase and whispered to her to follow him. Hurriedly they go by a by-path and reach a little country railroad station.

"Have you money?" he asked her

"No, I didn't have time to get my purse."

"Take this and this," he said, placing first some money and then a ring in her hand.

Before she had time to say anything he hurried her to an incoming train and helped her aboard. As she looked from the window of the departing train she saw her benefactor standing on the platform smiling after her.

One would think that the natural and most likely thing for an engaged girl to do upon reaching home after an absence of some weeks would be to send for her sweetheart. Helen thought so, but somehow she could not bring herself to do it. Every time she tried to think of him as she did before she went away from home the face of the chauffeur came before her eyes.

After several days of this sort of thing she weighed the matter earnestly, with the result that she sent for her future husband and told him she could regard him in that light no longer. The loss of the ring made it necessary to tell him that story, but the chauffeur's part in the matter was not mentioned.

"Did you ever hear of Mrs. Travis? That was the name." Helen thought she saw the man start.

"Yes, I've heard of young Travis in a business way. A good fellow to avoid, I imagine," he said.

When Helen was alone again she immediately sent to the employment office and asked that they find the chauffeur, giving his name and a full description of him.

The very next morning word was brought her that the man she was looking for was downstairs. Quickly she put on the dress and apron she wore at Mrs. Travis' and went down to see him.

"Helen!" he exclaimed as soon as she entered the room. "Forgive me for speaking so soon but I am so glad to see you again. Helen, dear, I love you. Do you, can you care for me?"

The time for analyzing her feelings had passed. She went into his arms. "I love you," she said simply.

While they were standing thus in silence Helen looked up suddenly and said: "Money doesn't matter, does it?"

"No," he answered, "but why do you speak of it now?"

"Oh, nothing. I was just thinking."

"Dear love," he said tenderly, "won't you come with me now? Don't let us be separated again."

For answer she clung closer to him.

Whether Cousin Jack came in at this time or what happened, Helen never knew, but when she and her chauffeur returned from the alderman she found her relatives ready to take possession of her home.

She knew, of course, that they had found out what they supposed to be a deliberate casting away of her fortune, but Helen had a little surprise for them—one that had startled her not a half hour before.

Speaking to her father's aunt she said, "Read this, it might interest you." Helen handed her a newspaper.

The headlines ran as follows:

"Parkman Dickerson, the noted sociologist, marries an heiress. They meet while both are disguised as servants."

The relatives silently departed.

"Isn't it remarkable," said Helen, "that I gave up the man I thought to be Parkman Dickerson to marry the real one whom I thought was somebody else?"

JOHN B. CLYMER has been assigned by the editor of the metropolitan section of the New York Sunday World, and also by the editor of the Sunday magazine of the New York Morning Telegraph, to cover the story of the Screen Club Ball, at Terrace Garden, April 19th.

Both stories are to be handled in a humorous way.

ANGEL OF MERCY
Gaumont Release April 8.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Eclair

"He Wants What He Wants When He Wants It," from the clever pen of Cartoonist McManus, is most interesting and funny. These films from the series of "The Newly Weds" are among the biggest hits on the market. "Phenomena of Crystallization," on the same reel, is an interesting and instructive educational bit.

"Within the Law" is an extraordinary production in two reels. One of the strongest two reelers that has appeared in regular release. It has a plot that, handled by the efficient players of the Paris Eclair studio, at times almost brings us to our feet.

Mecca

"By the Curate's Aid" is only fair, but can take its place in an ordinary program without much trouble.

Imp

"Keeping a great City Clean" is of special interest for out-of-town districts.

"The Terrible Turk," on the same reel, is a comedy so well produced, so acceptable in general composition, that the mediocrity of the theme is almost entirely overshadowed. It is, as produced by Director Daly, tremendously funny.

"The Bishop's Candlesticks," produced by Director Herbert Branon, is a splendid effort, from an artistic standpoint. The filmed story is an adaptation from Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables," taking the story of Jean Valjean from his release from prison and leading through the incident of the theft of the Bishop's candlesticks. The role of Jean Valjean has been wonderfully interpreted by Wm. Shay. Frank Smith as the Bishop has also done good work. The only criticism to be offered here is that the story as filmed does not correspond in all particulars with that of Hugo.

Pilot

"In the Battle's Smoke" on the whole is acceptable, although the battle scene is somewhat weak, and the country girl in slippers and white stockings following the plough is somewhat out of place.

Ramo

"Dangerous Sympathy," from the Ramo Studio, is very excellent in dramatic action, and the plot of the story is good. There is indeed a great deal of satisfaction to be gained in the witnessing of this film.

Essanay

"The Spy's Defeat" in two parts has quite sufficient interest to warrant a two-reel production. The plot of the story is clever, and the production runs without an apparent hitch.

"The Price of Gold," a drama with a moral. Very good and something that every young woman should see.

Biograph

"Edwin Masquerades" and "Their One Good Suit," on the same reel, as comedy goes are only fair, the latter being the pick of the two.

Kalem

"The Exposures of the Land Swindlers," in which Detective Wm. J. Burns posed for the Kalem Company, is a film of interest and merit apart from the appearance in it of the famous detective. The scene in the House of Representatives at Washington is one of the points of interest. The plot of the story is good, and through its three reels of film not a moment drags.

Vitagraph

"Checkmated" is a truly excellent drama, one of the kind that holds your interest from start to finish. It is something more than passing good.

Lubin

"Shipping a Clock" and "The Fake Soldiers," on the same reel, are cracking good comedies. The former, however, is much the better of the two.

"Dayton Ohio Flood Disaster," showing the terrible results of the recent flood, is heartrending. The interest of this film is of course universal.

Edison

"The Duke's Dilemma" is one of the quaintest comedies that has attracted the attention of the writer for some time. Mabel Trunelle and Marc McDermott figure prominently in the leads. The story is a quaint tale of life among the French aristocracy of over a century ago.

Selig

"Chinese Temples" is especially interesting at this era in the history of China. These ancient temples have been practically the bolsters of the Chinese people through their days of light and darkness. One of the most interesting of these is the fine pagoda temple of Indian architecture.

"A Lucky Mistake" on the same reel is a very fair comedy, not particularly strong in plot, in which the interpolation of the word "arrest" in place of "assist" made more than a "peck of trouble."

Kinemacolor

"Feathertop" is an adaptation from one of Hawthorne's most celebrated stories, and treats of the days when belief in witchcraft permeated New England and its people; some excellent samples of double exposure are demonstrated in this film.

"Out of the Darkness," a gripping drama, with plenty of sensational as well as the artistic in its makeup. The story centers around a young woman who through the shock of her husband's supposed death, loses her reason and continues to see visions of her husband. At last the husband is restored in body, and the young wife recovers. Fine photographic opportunities are taken advantage of in this picture.

"Modelling Extraordinary" is one of the best exhibitions of trick photography we have seen. It commences with a man trying to make putty models, which gradually, in the confused brain of the man, who is evidently addicted to drink, take on the most fantastical shapes and colors. Very amusing is this particular film.

"Steam," which is really the history of the steam engine and the steam locomotive, interwoven with the early life and love stories of the two men Watt and Stephenson, will be reviewed at length in the next issue of this magazine. This film is away above par in every particular.

Crystal

"The Veiled Lady" and "Our Parents-in-Law" on the same reel are both good comedy offerings, while "Homlock Shermes," reviewed last week as "The Girl in Overalls," has not improved much in the mending.

Frontier

"The Burning Lariat" is good in part, and would no doubt prove interesting to the casual observer, but is nevertheless somewhat weak in plot.

Nestor

"The Maid and the Milkman" as a comedy drama stands well—it gets over, but not with any particular gusto.

"The River Rhine," Germany, on the same reel, is a delightful bit, and gives an excellent idea of the scenic beauties of the historic stream.

Rex

"Until Death" in two reels is a tremendously strong drama. This film is a masterpiece of production. The plot is good and the work of the players excellent.

New General Manager for Nicholas Power Company

It is announced by the Nicholas Power Company that they have engaged the services of Mr. J. F. Skerrett as general manager. Mr. Skerrett is splendidly equipped for the duties of his office, having been for sixteen years associated with the Bureau of Electrical Inspection in the Department of Water Supply, Gas & Electricity, of New York City. The new general manager entered upon his duties on April 1st, and has already taken a firm grip on affairs. It is predicted that he will prove a distinct acquisition to this concern.

JUST GOSSIP

By The Mahoney

Troublous times, Mr. Film-man, troublous times!

The past week has been a most eventful one in the industry, and from indications, those most interested seem to be enjoying the sensation, for The Mahoney met one of his old-time associates (who now makes his home in the West) in Exchange Alley recently, and inquiring as to the meaning of his presence in New York, elicited the following colloquy:

"Oh! I met Bill Swanson and a bunch of live ones on their way East to join their various brigades, now mobilizing in the center of hostilities, so I just trailed along."

"You look pretty good for an old fellow," ventured The Mahoney.

"Well, I don't feel as good as I look, for I've been up all night consulting maps and charts of the various beleaguered factions, trying to determine which cause to espouse."

"What result?" asked The Mahoney, and for answer, the old time associate exhibited a large sized bank roll, with a self-satisfied smile.

"Where are the others?" ventured The Mahoney.

"They're in bed!"

* * * *

What a lot of food for conjecture is provided the observer in this great game of Cinematography. There is no enterprise of a business nature extant with such marvelous possibilities, that has developed such a prodigious array of hostile opposition to its advancement.

Suspicion lurks everywhere.

Why not eliminate the bellicose belligerents at once and forever? There is no argument so complicated that has not its "right" and "wrong" side.

Errors in judgment should not be an excuse for "welching."

If you make a business error, don't cavil about it, take your medicine, and when convalescent try and invent some honorable way to remedy it.

* * * *

The Mahoney has been a picture fan away back to the time when the filming of thirty feet of the American flag was considered an achievement. Has watched the wonderful growth and advancement since that time, but never before realized its marvelous possibilities to such a degree as he did Friday, March 28th.

The Savoy Theatre exhibited six first run, Patents Company releases, each one a masterpiece, viz.: "Hero Coward," Essanay; "Sally in Our Alley," Selig; "Gift of the Storm," Lubin; "Way to the Underworld," Edison, and a two-reel subject, "The Modern Prodigal," Vitagraph.

In the last named subject (a story so clearly defined pictorially that it might have been told without captions) among a most capable and efficient company of artists, two famous players (now deceased) occasioned a momentary shock by stalking boldly into the several scenes in which they appeared before the camera, looking as vigorous and healthful as they did in life.

Uncanny? No!

It was a delight to recall their brilliant artistic achievements, and unblemished private characters, during their long and honorable theatrical careers.

Requiescat in pace.

What a motley array of personalities entirely unknown in the field of theatricals have been attracted by the lure of the camera. Aside from the Patents Company contingent, many of whom have been retained for long periods, and a rare few in the older of the Independent ranks, the faces are one constant kaleidoscopic change of people. Types are prominent representing every known nationality.

We frequently see an unmistakable member of the "jeunesse dorée," of the "Ghetto," representing an heroic son of the Emerald Isle, and vice versa. Their action in the major part is amateurish and unskilled in the most minor details. Even to the eyes of those unpracticed in the crudest essentials of stage work, the utter unfitness of many seen in pictures today is most evident.

Why not employ experienced actors and actresses? There are hordes of them idle; willing and anxious to work.

* * * *

Mahoney Bob Gemp, long and prominently identified with dramatic work, and one of the early recruits to the field of motion pictures, whose experience covers engagements with Vitagraph, Edison, Solax, and other studios of the premier class, is much in evidence in Exchange Alley these days. Bob's expressive countenance and stalwart figure have been too little seen of late on the screen. Why?

* * * *

The Mahoney never could quite comprehend what occasioned Daniel Frohman and James K. Hackett to unbend to the vulgar photo-play. We thought it purely a commercial move, and a desire to annex "easy shekels"; but after seeing "The Prisoner of Zenda" last Sunday night, the reason was obvious. It was their wish to show some of the many delinquents in the industry what could be accomplished by real actors, real direction, and perfect environment, through the medium of the camera.

"The Prisoner of Zenda" has not been accorded its just meed of praise by the reviewers, for in the acting, the technique, the ensemble and environment, it surpasses anything The Mahoney has seen of like description.

The locations for the various exteriors are marvels of beauty and correctness; the designing and construction of the interiors the work of master hands. Such a variety and complexity of settings have rarely been shown. And the acting—well—did you ever see a Frenchman purse his lips, draw his fingers together and throw a kiss of supreme delight? Superb!

The work of Mr. Hackett. Mr. Hale, Mr. Torrence and Mr. Coulter was so smooth, effortless and natural that we imagined ourselves at Zenda and Strelsau, viewing the various situations incognito.

Benny, you certainly have one of the easiest exploitations to exploit you have ever exploited.

* * * *

Rumor has it that one of the most important of the Patents Company faction has a scenario written around the movements of the astral bodies and their inhabitants. One of the situations, it is claimed, involves a scene in which the fabled "Man in the Moon" figures in a prominent manner.

The story being one in which the main factor of the company is greatly interested, the director is at his wits' end how to get the effect. He consulted Garrett P. Serviss, the world-famous astronomer, who told him the only possible chance to get the wished-for effect would be to negotiate with the Man in the Moon.

The director in question at once communicated the substance of his inquiry to the head of the concern, who remarked, with a great show of assurance: "Vot's der matter mit King Baggott! Go get him! He's der Man in der Moon!"

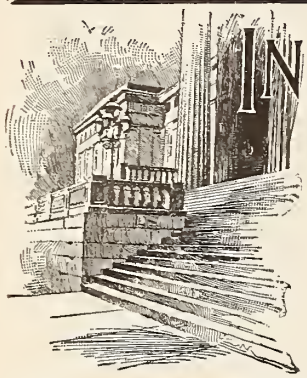
MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City



In the Patent Office, of greatest importance to all concerned is the scientific index of periodicals, which, begun more than twenty years ago, now requires careful revision in order to preserve its effectual use and meet the demands of progress in all the arts, notably electricity and other classes prominent in the world of invention to-day. The present unsatisfactory state of this index may well be expected, when no time has been given to revision and when those doing the work are not fully skilled in all the arts represented, although their training through experience has done much to qualify them for this line of work. A great saving of time has been effected by bringing to the library the triplicate set of French patents and arranging them in order of the French patent classification, which, though not perfect, is far better than a numerical arrangement for searches. These French triplicates have been stored in the galleries since 1903. The German triplicates still remain in these galleries, and should also be brought to the library for classification. This classification will save time, labor, and wear and tear of expensively bound volumes, as it is certain that did we not have the Abridgments of British Patents many volumes of inestimable value would have been badly damaged by constant use. All searchers agree that the classified volumes are much to be preferred to those arranged numerically or chronologically.

Apropos of the preposterous proposition to increase Patent Office fees, Senator Platt said: "A tax upon inventors which provides more than enough to pay the current expenses of the office is simply shameful. It is a tax upon knowledge, a tax on invention, a tax which in itself is as iniquitous and abominable as a tax upon authors or scientists would be."

Not to mention the seven or eight million dollars surplus in the U. S. Treasury to the credit of inventors and the Patent Office. Why pluck the Eagle?

Alvah C. Roelrick, of Chicago, Ill., has assigned Letters Patent No. 1,055,492 for Improvements in Kinetoscopes to The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., a corporation of Illinois. The invention has for its principal objects, first, to provide efficient arrangement of parts whereby an acceleration in the speed of the film-feeding drum is attained during the period in which it is imparting intermittent feed to the film, and thus attain a relatively shorter period of the film movement and a correspondingly increased period of film rest during each cycle of film movements. Second, to provide a simple automatic tension mechanism for the film at its point of exposure, which provides a minimum degree of tension at the beginning of the movement of the film to avoid a tendency to tear the spaces between the sprocket perforations of the film and an increase in such tension after the film is in movement; such increase in tension reaching its maximum when approximately three-fourths of the movement has taken place, and so continuing for approximately one-quarter of the cycle of the feeding mechanism to allow the film to become steady after its movement, the tension then gradually decreasing until the minimum point is reached, ready for a fresh cycle of the operations just described.

The accompanying view is a front elevation of the apparatus, the lens carrying front plate being removed, and parts being shown in section: 1 represents the casing; 4 the light aperture; 5 the light-controlling shutter; 6 the film-feeding sprocket drum; 7 a carriage moving on guide rods in vertical transverse relation to the optical axis of the kinetoscope and provided with bearings for countershaft 8; 13 is the main driving shaft operated by handle 14 and carrying primary spur gear 15, by which the train of actuating gears is driven, including the countershaft 16; 17 and 18 are knuckles on shafts 8 and 16, engaging with the intermediate shaft 19, formed with studs 20 resting in slots 21; 22 is a hanger for shaft 16, pivoted on shaft 30 in co-axial relation to gear 23, meshing with pinion 24 on shaft 16. Gear 23 also meshes with pinion 26 on shaft 25, which also carries wheel 27 forward with a cam groove 28, engaging a pin on cam arm 29, attached to shaft 30, carrying pinion 31; 32 are bearing strips suspended on standards 33; 38 is a frame pivoted on the carriage 7; 40 is a secondary frame pivoted to the carriage 7 and carrying spring fingers 42, bearing against strips 32. And so on for 250 folios and twelve specific claims and five sheets of drawings.

The subjoined trade-mark has been granted registration for photographic papers in favor of Anytone Limited, of Staveley, County of Westmoreland, England, used since May 3, 1912.

"The discoverer of new products of value in the arts and the inventor of new processes or improved machines, adds to the public wealth, and his right to the product of his brain is now recognized by the laws of all civilized nations."—From an old Government Bulletin.

Several hundred thousand dollars is a big price to pay for a vagrant piece of twine, and that is what it is estimated it will cost to replace over one million blades of the Lusitania's turbines twisted out of shape when the engines were reversed at full speed in order to avoid collision while entering Fishguard Harbor—all because of the falling of a small piece of cord into the telemotor, jamming the steering gear. Moral: Protect your telemotors.

A photographic paper, both sides of which may be printed upon without affecting the other, is the subject-matter of Letters Patent No. 1,052,779, granted to Frank G. Wilcox, of Kansas City, Mo. He proposes to form the paper of relatively thin material with a white body and protect the sensitive emulsion on one side of the paper from the actinic rays acting upon the sensitive emulsion of the other side of the paper by coloring the body of the paper with a suitable coloring substance capable of preventing the actinic rays passing through the body of the paper from one side to the other and of being eliminated or washed out subsequent to the printing step during the developing stage of making the photograph, or otherwise; or by coloring the sensitive emulsion with a suitable coloring substance such as will prevent the actinic rays from passing through the paper to the opposite sensitized surface and as will not materially affect the sensitiveness of the emulsion employed for coating the two sides of the paper, such coloring matter being capable of removal in the subsequent developing or finishing steps in the making of photographic prints; such coloring matter, when removed from either the body of the paper or from the sensitive emulsion, leaving the body of the paper white and in contrast with the imprint made by the actinic rays darkening or blackening the portions of the emulsion exposed during the printing of the object. In the accompanying view 1 designates the paper and 2 the sensitive emulsion, the after film thereof being removed in part.

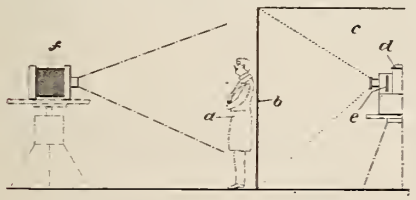
Hon. John Goode, in a public address, said that inventors "had contributed more to the welfare of their fellows in that period (referring to the last fifty years) than Alexander, Cæsar or Napoleon, and their names would survive when those of the great conquerors have passed into oblivion. . . . In future years the names of great soldiers will shine dimly beside the names of Fulton, Morse and Henry."

The accompanying monogram trade-mark for Moving Picture Films, Negative and Positive Films, and Kinetoscopes, used since November, 1910, has been registered by the Ortho Film Co., of Pittsburgh, Pa., No. 90,731.

A process of photographing objects with a projected background, affording possibilities and effects of the most varied and interesting character, is set forth by Hugo Sontag, of Erfurt, Germany, in his Letters Patent No. 1,053,887.

The invention consists in the picture forming the background being projected on a screen slightly tinted with a non-actinic color or color having a weak actinic action, such as yellow, red, green or the like, the object to be photographed, suitably lighted, being in front of the said screen, and being photographed with the background. The rays due to the lighting of the object, falling on the front side of the screen, are absorbed or rendered completely inactive, while the rays passing through the screen from behind and coming from the projector apparatus exercise their full action on the plate.



The object to be photographed, for instance, a person a, is disposed close in front of the projection screen b, which can be made of any suitable fabric, paper or glass plate, etc. In any case, the projection screen is slightly tinted with such a color that its chemical action is very weak, such as yellow, red or green. A mixture of the said colors could also be used for coloring the projection screen. The projection screen is in front of a dark chamber c, in which is placed the projection apparatus d, which takes the diapositive e, to be projected. The object a is suitably lighted by daylight and photographed simultaneously with the background projected on the screen b, by means of the apparatus f, by a single exposure of the photographic plate. In case of artificial lighting of the object a, the source of light is preferably arranged near the projection screen b, for instance, laterally of the same, in well-known manner.

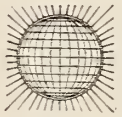
"The inventor has redeemed us from the curse of poverty, dissipated the mysteries of humbug and destroyed the monopoly of knowledge." Thus spoke the late Senator Daniel of Virginia, who also remarked that "The Romans of old assigned the highest place in the Elysian Fields to him who had improved human life by the invention of arts."

A COLD DAY FOR DEFENDANT

Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed in Freeze v. Harris, 162 Illinois Appeals 118.

Pathe Freres, of New York, N. Y., has applied for registration of this trade-mark for moving picture films, used since October 30, 1911.

"Trying it on the dog" is a well-understood professional term, not necessarily implying deception; and the patent law is presumably unavailable for the protection of fraud and misrepresentation, nevertheless, a patent has been granted to a Larchmont resident for a bone-shaped dog-biscuit, the idea apparently being to overcome the canine prejudice to the agglomerate by offering him a bonus.



The Liberty Statue as a trade-mark for goods shipped from any of the five boroughs of New York City, is being seriously considered by the Merchants' Association, to be used in conjunction with the motto "From Greater New York."

Good for good goods. Enlighten the world.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

Reliance and Majestic Desert Their Coney Island Factory

Beginning at an early date, the new Thanhouser factory at New Rochelle will, in addition to its own work, also handle the thousands of feet of film made from the negatives produced by the Reliance and Majestic studios. As the Thanhouser Company has long been noted for its splendid photography, this move will insure the Reliance and Majestic the same high grade of pictures photographically that they have been recently releasing. As a result, the large manufacturing plant at Coney Island, which also has a very good daylight studio in connection with it, will be on the market.

JACK RICHARDSON, "heavy" for the first "Flying A" company at Santa Barbara, and George Fields, "heavy" for the second, took part in some of the great horse races which have just started on the newly built speedway in fashionable Santa Barbara. Both Richardson and Field won their respective races with ponies from the stables of the American.

ERNST LUZ

IT affords me great pleasure to introduce to my readers T. Edgar Ray, of Newark, Ohio, and Geo. L. Hamrick, of Carrollton, Georgia, two musicians who are not only picture music enthusiasts, but have been able to convince exhibitors that picture music properly played and set to a picture is not only possible, but of advantage to the picture as well as entertaining. Both are orchestra leaders meeting with great success.

T. EDGAR RAY

GEO. L. HAMRICK

Mr. T. Edgar Ray has been a road leader for some time and seeing the possibilities of picture music decided to concentrate on that branch. From the programs I have received, I am positive that any theatre having his services must be benefited. The music selected shows his preference for good music, as well as his competency in selecting musical themes of similar temperamental value as are shown on the screen, which is the essential in picture playing or directing.

With the addition of many musicians such as Mr. Ray, who is a picture music enthusiast, the picture theatre will be of value to the musician and the industry at large.

Mr. Geo. L. Hamrick has been a late leader for the Montgomery Amusement Company. All who know of Montgomery know that he features his music and claims music as the medium of his success in all picture theatres. Mr. Hamrick started with piano, added a drum and then others until he had an orchestra. This might be termed starting at the bottom of the ladder, but it is the sure road to success in picture playing. My readers will remember an extract from a letter I received from Mr. Hamrick, appearing in these columns, which demonstrated to what extent he had been able to handle his orchestra, avoiding any friction in making segues.

Ill health compelled Mr. Hamrick to make a climatic change in his residence and consequently drop picture playing for a short time. In his recent correspondence he has informed me that he will take up the work again and I am sure that any exhibitor who obtains his services will note the value of proper picture music by the receipts at the door.

Personally I wish both Mr. Hamrick and Mr. Ray every success in the work and extend to them a hearty assurance that they can count on my co-operation in anything pertaining to their personal success as well as the success of "picture music."

There is a very erroneous idea among the best musicians and theatre leaders that each and every interchanging scene in the picture requires a temperamental or dramatic change in the music, which does not only destroy that which is entertaining in music but has a tendency of destroying picture interest as well as tiring your audience mentally. Music of this description has lately come to my notice, composed and adapted by an orchestra leader with extensive theatrical experience, who must know that at times when he has a dramatic production with fifty incidental cues he requires a rehearsal. The show is then played well by the orchestra on Wednesday or Thursday evening. Such a production plays three hours, then can he expect a score for a production playing one hour and twenty minutes, containing eighty to one hundred cues and thirty to forty other temperamental changes, that need be placed while playing, to be played in any creditable manner?

Such ideas will never advance picture music, for if it were necessary to have an average of twenty to twenty-five cues to one thousand feet of film, the work would not only be the most difficult of any in the profession of music, but would be practically impossible. It is ridiculous to think that each and every character can and should be followed by four or eight bars of a musical theme, and were it possible it could be of no benefit to the picture theatre, for it would destroy opportunities for the rendition of good and entertaining musical numbers. Music should be used and placed so as to follow the moods of the different characters or their concerted, not individual, action. When practical it is well to accent the heavy or villain with appropriate music at his first entrance, but it is of no value to continue doing so, for the audience immediately becomes familiar with the character and should not be needlessly disturbed by a continued repetition of non-melodic themes. The most dramatic 1,000 feet of film I have seen has called for but fourteen cues, which, while difficult, is possible, and with conveniently printed music for picture playing these fourteen could have been condensed into eight or nine. Clarity of story or plot in a picture play is impossible without at least one-third to one-half of the picture action and film being used for the introduction of characters and descriptive action. At such points one well-selected musical number, the theme of which is in sympathy with the basic thought to which the story caters, or holds the character color when the costuming and settings are characteristic, will usually suffice. When female characters are featured in such action, it is usually of quiet nature; when the male predominates it is more hilarious or boisterous. This should influence you in the selection of your numbers. The dramatic situations or action must be dealt with separately, and to make it effective an entirely new and different number from that preceding or succeeding should be used. There are many good standard compositions which are dramatic in the extreme and will hold high-tension interest when properly played. "Valse Triste," by Jean Sibelins, is such a number even though it be a valse lento movement. If we are to have better picture music, it is necessary to cater to that which is possible, and every effort should be made to make the music entertaining when that of an excitable character is not required. It is not possible that all pictures released will please all audiences, consequently when you get a more or less uninteresting program you have an opportunity to shine in making a more interesting selection of music which will materially assist in satisfying the audience, which is essential in holding the old and creating new patronage of your theatre.

The musician is not in a picture theatre for the sole purpose of making a noise and he should realize that he is a means whereby the management hopes to create patronage. Unless you want to be thrown into active competition with the many present mechanical devices, such as orchestrations, electric pianos and organs, get to work and play suitable music.

It is understood that the field of music in picturedom is large, and extends a welcoming hand to high-class musicians and composers, but it might not be amiss to suggest that on entering this field they should at least be rational and not endeavor to make of "picture music" that which they know to be impossible in any other branch of the musical profession. The creation of picture music requires as much if not more thought than any other, and it is far from impossible.

LOVE AND GOLD.—Mary Benson lives with her grandfather, a miserly old man, who compels her to bring home her wages to him, which he hoards away. Deprived of necessary food and clothing, Mary becomes ill while at her work. She is compelled to leave the factory, and on her arrival home is met with abuse from her grandfather, who accuses her of feigning illness. Mary resents her grandfather's attitude, which angers the old man, and he eventually orders her from the house.

On the way to town Mary faints at the entrance of a rich man's home. Jack Landers, a young physician, comes to her assistance and he takes her into his home. Jack becomes interested in Mary and persuades his father to allow her to remain with them until she recovers. Jack falls in love with Mary and gets her consent to marry him, but his father objects, as he has plans for Jack to marry Clara Morton, an heiress. Mary, who has overheard the conversation betwen Jack and his father, leaves the house rather than have Jack oppose his father's wishes.

Mary's grandfather is taken ill suddenly on the street and is assisted home by a workman, who meets Mary on the street and informs her of her grandfather's condition. In spite of his ill treatment, Mary goes home to care for him. The old man becomes delirious while in a trance, goes to the attic where he has secreted his gold, and finds that the money bags are filled with dust instead of gold. Mary arrives home at this moment and, finding her grandfather in a critical condition, tries to aid him. Being powerless, she rushes from the house to summon a doctor. Jack, who has been searching for Mary, meets her and learns of her grandfather's condition. He volunteers his services, which Mary gladly accepts. In a few weeks, under Jack's care, the old man recovers. He undergoes a great change. His vision has proven to him that his hoarded gold has deprived him of happiness and love.

Realizing that Jack and Mary love each other, the old man readily consents to their marriage, and when Jack's father tries to interfere, the old man produces a document showing that on the day of Mary's marriage she is the recipient of all of his gold. Jack's father is easily persuaded to give his consent, and love conquers gold.

DANGEROUS SYMPATHY.— Pagano, a young physician, attends the sick bed of Marie's mother, who lives with Marie and Lugi, Marie's husband, in the Italian quarter of New York.

Marie's mother dies, and Pagano is affected by Marie's sorrow and, in sympathy, extends her a flower and promises to send her others. He also gives a dollar to Nitas, Marie's baby sister. With this Marie obtains food and so arouses Lugi's jealousy.

A week later Pagano remembers his promise as he is buying roses for his fiancee. He sends a bouquet with a pleasant message. The florist gets the cards mixed. The fiancee gets the flowers with Marie's card and believes Pagano false. Lugi gets the bouquet for Marie and a card simply addressed "Dearest," and making an appointment. He thinks that Marie is false and, as the reverse of the card gives Pagano's address, he sets out to avenge his wrong. Marie follows to prevent the crime, if possible. In the meantime, Lugi enters the doctor's home on a false pretense, feigning illness. As the doctor leaves the reception room to fill a prescription for Lugi, Lugi takes advantage of this moment and rushes for the doctor, who closes the door in time. Lugi forces the door open and has the doctor at his mercy, when Marie enters in time to save the doctor's life. At this moment the doctor's fiancee comes in to tax Pagano's falseness. Explanations follow, wherein the exchange of cards is made obvious.

THE PRICE OF GOLD (April 2).—Which would you choose, providing you could have your choice in the matter? A husband with lots of money, one that you could not love, or a husband without money, one that you adored? This was the terrible question that confronted Lois Roberts. She had lived almost all her young life in want, so chose the former. Her sweetheart of old gave her up only too unwillingly and went back to his work as a railroad engineer. The empty life Lois led in all her wealth and splendor did not satisfy the woman who had decided to live without love. A short visit to her sister in the country, who had married a man in moderate circumstances, and was blessed with two loving children, awoke in Lois the spirit of motherhood. Lois returned to her beautiful mansion after she had seen her former sweetheart for the last time. Here we leave Lois to soh out her grief in not having married the man she loved.

WHEN SCANDAL THREATENED (April 17).—Sir John Glenavan neglects his young wife and his sister to go fox hunting. His sister, Victoria, is enamored of a dashing young blade, who in part returns her affections. But he is engrossed in a one-sided flirtation with Sir John's wife.

As Lady Glenavan and Victoria are sitting in a balcony overlooking the river, the dashing cavalier rows to where they sit and throws a note on the balcony. Lady Glenavan throws it into the river. Victoria, taking a rowboat, searches for the note, which she finds among the water-lilies. It reads: "Dear Maud, I know that you will never betray your husband, but without you I have no desire to live. I shall be waiting for you tonight at the little gate in the park in the hope ————. If not —Good-bye. Jack Treharne."

Sir John, with a servant, is in the woodland after game. He sees a veiled woman approaching hurriedly. Her garments are those of his wife. Astonished at seeing her in this lonely place at night unattended, he draws back into the bushes and watches. He follows. He sees her meet a man, who was waiting at the crossroad with two horses. They embrace. The woman doesn't lift her veil.

The baron pursues. Changing horses at an inn, he gains on the elopers. Arriving at a roadhouse, outside of which stand the horses on which the runaways had ridden, he is told that the man and woman are in a private room. In he dashes, disregarding the strength of the lock. There he confronts the veiled woman and the cavalier. He strikes the man. A fight is about to ensue. Sir John then snatches the veil from the woman's face. He starts back in surprise. "My sister!" he gasps. It is with a sense of relief as well as of pain that he finds that his sister is the runaway. He is glad, however, to know that it is not his wife, and that this action is remediable. He tells the cavalier, who is also amazed to see whom he has met, that English convention is imperative and that he must marry Victoria, having thus compromised her. The cavalier, believing that the worst can be the best, capitulates.

WHILE THE ROBBER ROBBED (April 24).—The manager of the Princess Theatre seeks free publicity. He informs newspapers that Miss Mela Drammer, leading actress in "The Green Camel" company, in a fit of artistic temperament, refused to appear in her part on the previous night, because her famous pearl collar had vanished. She subsequently went on, so the story went, the collar being found. It had been bidden in a joke.

The story "goes over" in great shape. Everybody talks about it. Consequently, "The Green Camel" does a rushing business.

The actress, while she didn't have the artistic temperament in the form attributed to her, had it in other ways. She was fearfully extravagant and was almost submerged in debt. Her jewels were paste, and her furniture bought on the installmen plan. Her whole fortune consisted of her radiant, happy-go-lucky youth, plus beauty.

She receives a note from a lawyer representing several creditors. He writes that if he doesn't receive a settlement within twenty-four hours her goods will be sold at auction. This doesn't trouble the actress. She goes to sleep with the happy serenity of childhood.

A man in the burglaring business has heard of the actress' pearl collar. He would like to have it. In the night he forces entrance into the house and finds the actress asleep. He takes the collar, which, of course, is paste. He is stricken by the actress' beauty. He hasn't the heart to take her belongings. He notices the dun from the lawyer, and numerous bills. This determines him in his action. He restores the jewels to the dressing-table. All he takes away is a rose.

In the morning the actress awakes and is alarmed to find that her much-advertised pearl collar has vanished. She at last finds it where the burglar had left it. She never knew that she had been visited by a burglar and that she was as effective to the hearts of men when asleep as when awake, until, when opening a letter that day, she reads: "Darling: I am sorry my visit last night was so brief. It grieves me to think that one so young should be worried by debt. I therefore enclose money to satisfy your creditors and have taken a rose in exchange. Yours, Jack."

WINTER SPORTS AT ARE, SWEDEN.—This charming subject opens with a panorama of Are, a little place prettily situated at the foot of Mount Areskutan. With the high ground beyond and a lovely blue sky, this beginning is very attractive. As the panorama continues, the whole of the mountain comes into view; its slopes are covered with snow. The next scene shows the railway station, Are, and some people waiting for a train. We next see the funicular railway on which tourists ascend Mount Areskutan.

We are now introduced to the Winter sports at this favorite resort. Men clear away the snow from an extensive track over which sleighing will take place. Horse sleighing and skiing come first. In the former sport ponies draw men along. The animals are fairly speedy, though their appearance is not much to boast of. In these sports the Swedish flag will be noticed. It has a yellow cross on a blue ground.

Juvenile tourists, not at all skilled, now engage in a race on skis. Views of skiing follow; men cross a snowclad hillside, and the pines in this section, with snow on the leaves, make an artistic picture. Bobsleighing, in which tobogans are used, is full of movement and interest. The last section illustrates ice yachting at the base of Areskutan. A sleigh is fitted with a sail and it is surprising how great a speed is obtained in a fair breeze. The last picture includes a magnificent sky photograph, making a scene of surprising beauty and realism.

NATIVE CARNIVAL PROCESSION, CEYLON.—This curious and interesting scene was witnessed on the occasion of the election of a Cingalese leader to an important position in local affairs. Apparently the whole village has turned out in honor of the occasion, for the street is crowded with people bearing garlands and flags, and the procession takes some time to pass. In the rear are several fine elephants. The film is of special interest on account of the picture it gives of the costumes and appearance of the Cingalese.

THE SULIT NUGGET (April 11).—John Stanton, a miner, his wife and children, a son and daughter, live in a cabin about a mile from Stanton's claim. The claim has never proved to be a paying proposition, until one day the boy accompanies his father to work. He wanders away, and while playing, discovers several stones, which he carries back to show to the father. They prove to be nuggets, one more valuable than the rest. They return to the cabin, and the father, to commemorate the occasion, takes the nugget and cuts it in half, giving one part to the boy and the other to the girl. The father starts out to work one morning and takes the boy with him. While at work the cabin is attacked by Indians, who kill the mother and set fire to the house. The father hears the fight and, bidding his son wait for him, he starts for the cabin. He arrives as the Indians have about completed the outrage, and gives them battle. He is mortally wounded, and the Indians depart, taking the girl with them. In the meantime the boy gets worried at his father's continued absence and starts for home. He arrives just before the father dies, and the father tells him to be on the watch for his sister and find her if possible. Later the boy is found by a party of prospectors and cared for. Fifteen years elapse and the boy has grown to manhood. The prospectors who adopted him have struck it rich, and are owners of a valuable mine. The boy holds the position of cashier. In the meantime the girl has been brought up by the Indians, although she has never become quite accustomed to their habits and customs. One day while away from the camp, she meets a young man who is immediately smitten by her beauty. After several meetings, he proposes to her and is accepted. They are married and he takes her to a home. Unknown to the girl, her husband is a bandit. Poverty overtakes them and the young husband resolves to look for work. He sees a pack train carrying gold dust from the mine to the bank and decides to rob it. He carries out his plan, and in the holdup Harold is wounded. The bandit gets the gold and escapes. The wounded boy chances upon the cabin and his wounds are dressed by the girl. The bandit returns home and is overpowered by Harold. One of the miners who went for aid has formed a posse and is returning to the scene of the holdup. They follow the tracks to the cabin. In the meantime the boy, having learned that the bandit's wife is his sister, decides to save her husband. He sends the posse on a false trail and takes his sister and her husband to the Mexican border, gives them money to start life anew, and thereby loses the sister he has just found.

A SHOWER OF SLIPPERS (April 7).—The advent of a new minister is quite an event in the average rural community, and what society exists in the small towns and villages often is within the church circles.

The story deals with the Rev. John Ashton, who has accepted a call in a certain little village, and the story opens with a house-warming that he and his sister, who acts as housekeeper, have given.

Mary Crawford, a young member of his flock, happens to notice under his desk during this party a pair of very much worn slippers and she decides to make him a new pair. The prying proclivities of some of the maiden ladies of uncertain age find out that Mary is making the slippers for the minister. The gossips' tongues start to wag, and the outcome of it is that all the old maids in the vicinity, unknown to each other, give the new minister a pair of slippers.

The parson is called away to a conference, and during his absence his sister finds the lot of slippers and trades them off for a bread mixer to an itinerant peddler.

When this peddler appears at the different homes of the donors of the slippers with them displayed for sale they are quickly recognized, and it does not take much of an imagination to picture the complications that ensue. When all have reclaimed their gifts from the peddler and left the minister and Mary alone, she brings out the slippers which she had made and presents them and he accepts them, with the condition that the "giver goes with the gift," and wins a bride at the end.

A good quaint comedy showing real life in a little village.

OLD JIM (April 8).—Old Jim, father of young James Short, was addicted to drink, which nearly caused not only his own but his son's downfall. Young Jim was boss of Pearson's big quarry, and in the course of time fell in love with Amy, the elder daughter.

First we meet the boss ordering his men when Pearson, Amy and the little lame sister come to visit the quarry just after old Jim has been to his son to beg for money to buy more rum. On the promise of better behavior, he receives some. Next we see the temptation prove too much. Old Jim falls, gets drunk and staggers out of the town saloon just as Pearson is overtaken by James and his two daughters. Amy tells of the engagement just made, but when her father catches sight of old Jim he refuses to accept the latter's son as a husband for his daughter.

Young Short takes his father home, realizing that all is over. When old Jim comes to his senses and remembers the embarrassing scene on the street, it seems to put new life in him and he absolutely promises to do better. He meets the two sisters on the street. The little lame one runs to kiss him and he tells of his oath, begging Amy to try to think well of him.

The day of the big blast is at hand. All the town folks have gathered to witness it, good and bad. Some of them, seeing old Jim, try to tempt him, but to no avail. He sticks to his oath not to drink. While preparing the blast, the little one wanders away to play. She discovers the burning fuse on its way to the embedded powder and it fascinates her. She follows it and just about reaches the blast when old Jim sees her from the distance and rushes to her just in time to save her. By a miracle, both are saved. His heroic act is witnessed by the crowds; his past badness is forgotten and Mr. Pearson accepts James for his son-in-law.

A realistic story, full of the heart-interest which "grips" the audience.

WOMAN'S HONOR (April 12).—Madge Williams, a shawl about her figure, crept into the little town, a cast-off woman. Billy Wayne made love to dainty Jessalyn on the front porch of the rector's house, and Father Bob, the handsome young priest, stopped to smile at the evident love of Billy and the coquetry of Jessalyn.

A week later young Benton was making violent love to Jessalyn, and Father Bob frowned, for Benton was a backslider and bore a bad reputation in town. Meanwhile, Madge Williams sought out Benton, her destroyer, and begged him to marry her. But he had cast her off and refused. The climax came when Jessalyn, with a small package under her arm, fled with Benton. The priest saw and followed to the little village park. The four met—a priest, a backslider, an innocent girl and a woman who had been wronged. Words, hot and hasty, followed. Benton struck at the priest and the priest became angry, delivering a blow which laid Benton flat upon the grass. When he rose, the priest joined his hand with that of Madge and made them man and wife. Just then the village sexton, father of Jessalyn, hurried to the scene, gun in hand. But the affair was over for Jessalyn, and she went quietly back home with her father. Father Bob took his way, and the man and woman newly made husband and wife faced each other. And the woman smiled, kissed her ring and bade him farewell forever.

HIS SON-IN-LAW (April 11).—John Cameron, a wealthy widower, sends his daughter Edna away to college. Quite by accident, the young lady meets Hugh Macy, a very nice young man, and falls in love with him. Hugh is also hard hit, and proposes to Edna and is accepted. He begs her to be married immediately and she finally consents. Without letting anyone know of the affair, they hasten to a minister and the ceremony is performed. Edna starts to write the news to her father, when Hugh gets a call to the city. They decide that Hugh shall call on his father-in-law and smooth matters over. Edna sends her father a letter telling him that she is married and that her husband will call upon him the next day. When Cameron receives this he is furiously angry, and writes a red-hot letter to Enda in reply saying that he has no desire to see her husband and will not even allow her to return home until she has disposed of him. He places the letter in his pocket and starts out to mail it when a clerk enters with a special letter from a salesman representing a firm of which Cameron is the head saying that one of the firm's best customers, being afraid to carry a large amount of money, would like to secure a thousand dollars from the firm and have it charged to their account. Cameron resumes his seat at his desk, forgetting the letter to Edna.

The next day Edna and Hugh, receiving no reply from her father, take it for granted that silence means consent, and Hugh leaves for the city. He calls at Cameron's office, and the latter mistakes him for the out-of-town customer. Nothing is too good for him, and Cameron personally takes charge of him, wines him, dines him, and finally gives him the thousand dollars. Hugh mistakes this for a wedding present, and wires Edna to hurry home, that everything is O. K. She arrives at the house just as her father is drinking a toast to the supposed customer. He is surprised to see her, but is thunderstruck when she throws herself into the stranger's arms. The maid enters with a telegram saying that the customer was delayed and will not arrive until later.

Cameron realizes that the joke is on him when he finds the letter to Edna still in his pocket. But Hugh has proven that he is a good fellow, and Cameron tears up the letter and welcomes them home.

THE LADY DOCTOR.—The whole is enacted by university students. Claire, a pretty girl studying for a lady doctor,, does not care for men—or says she does not, and will have nothing to do with them, particulary four students, chums, who are greatly attracted by her. Three of these chums (for one will have nothing to do with it), tired of being continually snubbed by her, resolve upon a scheme which will not only bring themselves under her notice, but cause her, through doctor's instincts, to care for them; in fact they become malingerers. At various times when Claire is near, one pretends to sprain his wrist, another cuts himself badly, and the third has fainting fits. Claire falls into the trap and doctors the three chums, much to their delight. Meanwhile Dan, the fourth chum, will not impose upon Claire's kindess in this fraudulent manner. But a girl friend discovers that the chums are merely shamming, and tells Claire of it; and the two plan revenge. The chums together, coming along a country road, find Claire in a ditch with her bicycle on top of her, evidently having met with an accident. She says she has broken her ankle; so the four reverently carry her home on a hurdle. As soon as she reaches her door, however, she leaps from the hurdle and runs away laughing. To their disgust they see other people, too, are capable of a little malingering. So when the chums again come across Miss Claire lying

THE LEADER OF HIS FLOCK (April 17).—King Baggot is a popular young minister of an aristocratic church. The younger members of the congregation idolize him and he is looked upon with admiration and respect hy the entire congregation.

The hoard of trustees, a set of wealthy and very conservative old gentlemen, are a little shocked hy his rather socialistic sermons, hut all is well until the congregation is shaken hy a scandalous state of affairs discovered in the tenement owned hy the president of the hoard of trustees.

A young woman (Jane Gail) is suddenly deserted hy her hushand, who leaves for parts unknown, leaving her and a hahy penniless and friendless. The landlady jumps to the conclusion that the couple were not married as the girl is unknown in the community and her hushand has torn up her marriage certificate and all proofs of marriage when he departed.

The child dies and the minister is called hy the attending physician to comfort the young mother in such terrihle straits. He furnishes money for the hurial of the child and returns, much saddened at heart, to his parsonage, where he finds a hevy of young girls from the congregation husily engaged in the decorating of his rooms with flowers and loading his old mother with attention.

After the hahy's funeral Jane is snubhed and ill-treated on all sides and, desperate, determines to leave the city where her name is scorned.

Weak and ill from lack of food she falls, a moaning, pitiful creature, in the light outside a window, a light hurned hy the minister in his study to lead him to all "who were weary and heavy laden." Here he finds her and he learns her story and determines that outcast that she is her home will he in the parsonage with him and his mother. Later the congregation, especially the older memhers, led hy the president of the hoard and his wife, determines that the alleged disreputahle girl must he turned away from the parsonage and, when the minister refuses to permit it, force his resignation and, with his mother and Jane, he hids farewell to his church and home.

He takes a mission in the slums and preaches the gospel of good will and kindliness to all upon the streets.

The wretched hushand of Jane, unahle to prosper alone, returns in search of his wife hut cannot locate her. He has hecome a thing of rags and patches, drunken and sodden, and attempts to roh the cash register of a saloon in which he has heen hegging, hut is discovered hefore he can perpetrate the theft and runs from the hartender and a policeman out into a fearful rain and thunder storm. In an attempt to escape he takes refuge among the congregation of a mission. He is arrested there hut the minister intervenes and persuades the officer and hartender to permit him to take care of the weak hrother. They consent and depart and the minister feels that he has plucked a hrand from the hurning, only to discover that this drunken, vicious wretch is the hushand who deserted Jane.

The minister tries to effect a reconciliation hut Jane refuses to allow her hushand to touch her and, incensed, the wretch tells her the reason she no longer loves her hushand is hecause she has fallen in love with the minister. King overhears this and silences the hushand with revilings like a lash and the hushand goes cut, cursing, into the storm. The minister and Jane fear the terrihle fact that they have in truth fallen in love with each other, and each alone hattles for strength to resist the temptation to go to each other.

Out in the storm the hushand, cursing himself, his trip and heaven, is struck down hy the arm of the Lord and huried under a wall of a huilding torn down hy the lightning's hlast. His dead hody is carried to the mission and the minister prays for mercy for the dead.

In the meantime the old congregation have heen unahle to get along with their new minister or he with them, and when his resignation comes the hoard of trustees are forced to send after their old leader of the flock. King gladly agrees to return, naming as conditions only that he hring his mission hohhy along with him and that his wife he treated with such deference as her heautiful spirit deserves.

The trustees are amazed that their minister has married the girl, hut learning the full merits of the case they accede gladly to the terms, and the end of the picture finds King Baggot preaching his message of gladness and good will toward a reunited congregation in which sits his wife and mother with smiling hut tearstained faces.

Time passes, and the care of the rancho takes up the greater part of Miguel's attention, so that while he still loves his hride she sees hut little of him and hecomes despondent. This state of mind causes her to hecome temporarily infatuated with the suave Don Diego, a visitor, who finally persuades her to go away with him. Meanwhile, Pedro, unahle to appreciate the dignity of toil is discharged hy Miguel. Mounting his hurro he leaves the rancho and, later, while idly reclining heside the road, sees Diego and Maria ride hy. Puzzled, he follows and sees them enter a small inn for lunch, leaving the horses tied outside. He senses something wrong and releases one of the animals sending it galloping off. The alarm is given, and Diego, mounting the other, starts in pursuit. Pedro then plays the familiar love song and Maria, who has already hegan to repent her move, comes out and hegs him to take her home. Maria refuses to return with Diego, who overtakes them after capturing the escaped horse. Pedro interferes and heats the angry and discomfited don, and Maria and Pedro start for home.

Meanwhile Miguel has learned of Maria's departure, and has started in pursuit. He meets them on the road and Maria confesses, pleading for forgiveness. This Miguel at first declines to give, hut the sound of the love song from Pedro's guitar causes him to relent and so all ends happily. The hushand and wife are united, and Pedro is allowed to dream and play his guitar to his heart's content.

He seeks a puhlic stenographer and, entering Flo's office, he dictates his letters and finds the girl mighty attractive. He later sends his office hoy for the finished letters, who, in taking them up, also takes her manuscripts hy mistake. Phil finds them and is struck hy the heauty of the poems. He returns them in person and meets her father at the same time. He compliments the old poet on his work and goes.

At Grace Richly's home, Grace reads some poems of her own making to her friends. They applaud—all except Phil, her intended. She asks him where she can have them typewritten and he takes her to Flo's office and leaves her there. While waiting, Grace reads the poet's work and offers to huy them for a good price, and Flo, desiring to encourage her father, sells them to the girl. Grace takes them to the puhlisher, who, noting the signs of wealth of his caller, reads the poems and agrees to puhlish them. They make a great artistic and monetary success and Grace is lionized. In the meantime Phillips, heing without a stenographer persuades Flo to take a permanent position with him and she is glad of the opportunity.

A month later Grace sends a copy of her book to Phil, who telephones his congratulations. Poor Flo looks on, wishing her dear old dad could have had the credit which rightly helonged to him, hut she is unahle to say anything in honor hound. That evening Phil calls upon Grace and when she reads the poem she favors most he recognizes it and turns upon her and finally leaves her. He goes to the home of the poet and tells him of the publication of his verse, and when the old man shows anger toward Flo, Phil shows him that he is interested in her future and persuades him to he encouraged and to write others, not hampered hy the stress of poverty.

PAYING FOR SILENCE (April 18).—Walter Patten, the editor of an influential newspaper, is enamoured of Tira Lawes, a frivolous young girl. Tira is not sure of her own mind. Tira's hrother, Ted, teases her and tells her she will die an old maid. He goads her to temper and she hets him a hox of gloves she can make Patten propose to her. Patten proves an easy victim, hut he overhears the victorious Tira claiming her wager from Ted. Patten is utterly shocked and his feelings are outraged. He confronts the couple and, sending Ted away, slowly and deliherately takes the ring from Tira's finger and, flinging it out of the window, turns and leaves the house.

Too late Tira seeks the ring and finds that it means much to her. She grieves silently, hut is too young and proud to offer any explanation to Patten. Ted gamhles and is involved in an affair at the cluh in which he is unfairly accused of cheating at cards. One of Patten's reporters is a memher of the cluh and, despite Ted's request that the matter he hushed up, the reporter rushed off to Patten with the story. Patten sees his chance to get even and, to soothe his outraged pride, he arranges to make a sensational story of the episode.

Ted is quite seriously injured and he prevails upon Tira to go to Patten and intercede for him to save his honor. Tira does this against her will. Her petition is so pathetic that Patten's heart melts and he tells her he will suppress the news if Ted will reform. The promise is given and the edition is stopped at the eleventh hour. Later Patten calls to see how Ted is and to give him some advice.

Patten bids Tira good-bye but turns back and sees her looking after him with a beseeching love in her whole attitude. Patten capitulates and takes her in his arms. Tira shyly brings forth the ring which Patten threw away and he again places it on her finger.

He enters the room and demands that Ferdie fight him a duel, and orders Mrs. Cool into the next room. She goes. The men raise their pistols and on a shot from Ferdie's revolver Mr. Cool drops to the floor. Ferdie runs out of the house frightened. Mrs. Cool enters the room and is horror-stricken to find her husband supposedly dead. She decides to join him and tries to shoot herself, while hubby, on the floor, is enjoying the huge joke. Three times she shoots herself and falls to the floor, but on each occasion she is surprised that she is still uninjured. Meanwhile Ferdie has rushed into a policeman's arms and informed him that he has killed a man. They return to the house, whereupon Mr. Cool sits up and Ferdie rushes pell mell away from the supposed ghost, while Mr. and Mrs. Cool make up, she promising never to flirt again.

On the same reel:

THE MYSTERY OF THE LOST CAT (April 16).—While Mrs. Ray is getting supper for her pet cat, it jumps out of the window and, like many another feline, temporarily disappears most mysteriously. After futile search she calls up Burstup Homes, who is delighted to take the case because of its deductive and inductive possibilities. Burstup comes to Mrs. Ray's apartment and examines the rooms. His methods are very elaborate and ceremonious and he shrouds his movements in considerable mystery. He examines the cat's paw prints, finds cat's hair, and a piece of music entitled "And the Cat Came Back." These he considered invaluable clues and immediately proceeds to make further investigation. His alert attention is attracted by music downstairs and so he exits via the fire escape and on the floor below finds a man playing "And the Cat Came Back." This suspect offers a connecting link in his chain of evidence and so he lassoes him and, after tying up the musician, he proceeds to secure further evidence. Going further down the fire escape to the second story, he finds an artist at work painting a cat. This is further evidence of the man's complicity in the disappearance of Mrs. Ray's Angora, and so he pulls in the artist and ties him also to the rope, thus making another link in the chain of evidence. In another part of the building he locates a colored cook frying sausages. Naturally he suspects the cook and questions the originality of the sausages. He continues on his way through the building and arrests many persons on trivial clues which directly or indirectly connect them with cats. Finally Burstup reaches the basement and here, he imagines, is his crowning success. He finds four crooks, three men and a woman, who are quarreling about a fur piece. Burstup sees the fur and thinks it is the cat's skin, appropriates same, and arrests the crooks and drags them along with his other suspects to the police station. He ties them all to the mudguard of his automobile, which breaks down, and which finally gets to the police station with the aid of a "one horse" power. In the meantime Mrs. Ray's cat comes back and she goes to the police station and advises Burstup, and all the prisoners are consequently discharged by the judge, and Burstup leaves amidst jeers. This ignominious defeat by no means dismays him and he goes forth as proud and as confident as ever and is convinced that the police are jealous of his reputation and ability.

WHERE LOVE DWELLS (April 18).—Mrs. Barton, rich and snobbish, writes her poor sister that she will give the latter's daughter, Jennie, a home with her. Jennie, a beautiful and happy creature, does not care to go but her parents, realizing the opportunity, insist, and Jennie, with heavy heart, leaves for her new home. Arrived, the Bartons' coldness, formality and artificiality chill and stun her and she longs for her humble home.

One night at a reception given in honor of the noble Barry Lee, Mrs. Barton insists that Jennie wear one of Flora's castoff gowns, and Jennie, obeying, makes a ridiculous appearance. The guests respectively laugh and twit her and file into the ballroom, leaving her alone. After the first sting of the humiliation has passed, Jennie rebels, dresses herself in one of her simple homemade dresses, descends again to the drawing room and makes a complete conquest of all the men and especially Barry Lee, whom Flora hopes to win. Lee makes love to Jennie, but she, believing him engaged to Flora, repulses him just as Mrs. Barton and Flora surprise them. The latter are furious, denounce Jennie, and pack her off to her room.

Jennie, hurt and indignant, packs her valise to go. Barry, learning of her decision, and in spite of Mrs. Barton's and Flora's efforts to detain him, offers to take Jennie to her home. She reluctantly consents and there at last she is happy in the little home where love dwells.

THANHOUSER

THE PATRIOT (April 8).—The storekeeper was the biggest man in Cranberry Centre, and his neighbors were convinced that he would be a political hero some day. He dutifully attended all conventions of his party, was on terms of personal friendship with the legislative candidates (during campaigns) and each day became more and more convinced that the fate of the republic rested heavily upon his shoulders.

When his party assumed power at Washington, after many long years, the idol of Cranberry Centre decided that his services were needed at the nation's capital. His wife protested that it would be far better for him to remain at home and attend to business, but he overruled her. He was absolutely convinced that the new President needed him, so he determined to sacrifice himself upon the altar of his country.

A delegation of his admiring neighbors cheered him as he departed, but the cheers were not echoed when he arrived in Washington. He found that city plumb full of patriots who were trying to save the country, and no one seemed to want the big man of Cranberry Centre. At first he had fondly hoped to be urged to accept a Cabinet position but as the weeks went on he would have taken a place as janitor had it been offered. His money ran out, and appeals to his wife for more brought no response. She was convinced that he was squandering their savings upon "pesky politicians," so contented herself with advising him to come home. He did, but was compelled to walk.

There was no crowd out to greet him when he limped into Cranberry Centre over the ties. Everybody was in at the storekeeper's home, as he discovered later. He arrived just in time to witness the conclusion of the marriage ceremony which united his daughter to a young farmer. In days gone by the storekeeper had scouted the idea of such an alliance, being determined that his girl should be the bride of a statesman. Now, wiser by sad experience, he uttered no protest, and at the same time solemnly swore that he would cease being a patriot and devote his attention to the mercantile business.

THE CHANGELING (April 11).—A millionaire's little son while out walking with his nurse, slipped away and mysteriously disappeared. Detectives scoured the country far and wide, but without result. Finally the conclusion was regretfully reached that the little chap must be dead, for the handsome reward offered for his recovery would have tempted anyone who knew of his whereabouts.

An unscrupulous woman, who lived by her wits, read an account of the affair, and was amazed by the startling resemblance the missing boy bore to her own son. She decided to take advantage of the likeness, and presented herself at the wealthy widower's home with her son. The child was at once accepted as the missing heir. The millionaire offered her employment as nurse to his "son" and the woman and her child seemed assured of comfort and luxury as long as they lived.

The millionaire's child had not died. When he ran away from his nurse he hid in a freight car, intending to frighten her, but the joke became serious when the train started and he was unable to get off. A surly brakeman put him off the train many miles from his home. Later, the little fellow was injured in an accident and was cared for by a kindly farmer's family. He was unconscious for weeks, and when he recovered he found that no one would credit his assertion that he was a millionaire's son. His clothes were ragged and shabby now, and he looked like a beggar boy.

But the boy had a good deal of pluck, and he finally got home, although he had to walk a good part of the way. The scheming woman realized that he was the rightful heir and tried to bar him from his home, but he forced his way in and the puzzled father had to choose between two boys who were alike as two peas. But the youngster's pet dog recognized his little master at once, and hurled himself upon him with yelps of joy, and the boy soon convinced his father that he had been the victim of a deception. "The Changeling" was a very surly boy, quite different from the cheery temperament of his real son, and the father had often grieved over his boy's changed disposition. The adventuress and her son left the home which they had grown to look upon as their own and were never heard from again.

FRONTIER

SOME DOINGS AT LONESOME RANCH (April 17).—Two-thirds of the people of the entire world are susceptible to superstitious thought and will allow themselves to feel that to have about them or connected with them a cross-eyed person means bad luck, and will resort to methods not always fair to get rid of them.

Our story deals with a young lady with deformed eyes who accepts a position on Lonesome Ranch as general housemaid. The cowboys of said ranch were pining for the sight of a pretty face and when the ranchwoman, after deciding that the washtub was no place for her, wrote to an employment agency asking that a trim, neat girl be sent her for general housework, there was happiness and anticipation in the minds of said cowboys.

When an answer came back from the agency that a girl had been sent that would undoubtedly prove satisfactory they started to slick up to meet her. To the supposed lucky cowboy who was selected to go to the depot for her came several troubles in the shape, first, of the holding up by the other cowboys of the rig shortly after he had met the young lady at the depot. The boys take the girl from him and compel her to mount one of their horses. They ride home with her leaving the unfortunate cowboy with nothing to do but to haul the buggy back to the ranch, which he attempts to do. Coming down a very steep grade the buggy gets away from him; it runs over him; the buggy upsets; is broken into many pieces. He is not discouraged and, tying his lariat to the girl's trunk, decides that "Faint heart ne'er won fair lady." He then starts to drag the trunk hack to the ranch.

In the meantime the hoys arrive at the ranch with the girl, who has from the very first heen heavily veiled, and not one of the cowhoys have succeeded in getting a glimpse of what they feel, judging from the trim little figure, must he a beautiful face. The ranchwoman and man take her into the house, leaving the cowhoys hilarious and slicking up just a hit in the hope that they will he the lucky man to secure her attentions. The young lady has heen taken into the house, where she starts to take off her veil and coat. The ranchwoman gets a glimpse of her crossed eyes and falls hack in astonishment; she then turns her face upon the ranchman and he heats it for the door as fast as an express train can travel. The ranchwoman, in the meantime, has collected herself and finds satisfaction in the thought that at least there is one young lady that her husband and the cowhoys will not flirt with. The girl is put to work immediately. We see her coming out toward the hack of the house, where she seats herself upon a hench and starts paring apples as her first preparation of the arranging of the dinner.

In the meantime the hoys have slicked up and are waiting for their opportunity to propose. The fun starts almost immediately, and each one gets stung. The poor girl starts for the house, meets one of the cowhoys' horses; as she is looking for sympathy, she pets the horse's head; the horse looks into the girl's face and immediately starts kicking holes in the air. The girl rushes out of the picture and into a hen coop.

The hoys in the meantime have gathered at the other end of the coop, and the poor chickens, after catching a glimpse of the hoodoo's eyes, struggle for liherty. The door flies open and they fly out of the coop in all directions, refusing to have anything to do with the cross-eyed hen. The hoys decide it is nearly time to get rid of the hoodoo. One of the hoys gets a lariat. It is placed around the neck of the girl and she is dragged away to he strung up. We next see the hoys coming into view pulling the girl after them. A tackle and fall is handy. They tie her to the hood and hoist her into the air. The poor girl feels that her last moment is at hand. A cowhoy who has had nothing to do with worrying the poor girl, and possihly hecause of the fact that his own face is hadly disfigured, comes into the picture and at the point of his gun drives the cowhoys away and releases the girl from her perilous position. The girl rushes to the house, gathers up a few of her helongings and rushes away from the ranch, feeling that it was nearly time to move.

Five minutes after she has left for the depot a letter arrives for her, hut none of the cowhoys will volunteer to take it to her excepting the poor, deformed fellow who has at all times sympathized with her. He makes a leap for his horse and rushes out of the picture. He catches up with the girl and hands her the letter. She thanks him. He tries to get her to come hack, hut she refuses. They shake hands and hid each other goodhy, he going away with a sad heart and feeling that he wishes he could make things different for her. After he has gone she reads the letter and finds that she has fallen heir to a large fortune left hy her late uncle. She goes hack to the city and, in passing a beauty parlor a short time later, sees a sign in the window which reads: "Faces made over to order." She enters. Later we see her coming out; the transformation is complete and wonderful; she is now heautiful.

A few days later we find her on the way to Lonesome Ranch, for a keen desire has entered her heart to get square with the boys at the ranch. The hoys are now ready to fall over each other to show their appreciation. She flirts with them desperately, hut at the last moment looks up the poor, homely, honest cowhoy, and after a short argument he decides to agree with her that they should marry and go East. Later we find them coming out of the same heauty shop, and he also has heen made over into a fine-looking man. His reward was great, hut there are few of us who will not say he was most deserving.

AMERICAN

SUSPENDED SENTENCE (April 14).—Old Judge Gainsworthy smiled douhtfully as he pinned a sheriff's star on the coat of young Frank Walling, for Frank was very young for the joh. He did not, however, turn an unsmiling face toward Frank's assiduous suit of his daughter's hands.

Taking a drink a few days later with a stranger, the judge noticed counterfeit money in his hands. A day later the stranger was found murdered and rohhed and the youthful sheriff, with hoyish enthusiasm, rounded up a wayfaring cowpuncher. The jury pronounced him guilty, hut Judge Gainsworthy refused to pronounce sentence then. A sleepless night sent him to Oak Flats. He stopped for a drink, noticed the hartender refuse a counterfeit hill from a hlack-looking gunman, called up the youthful sheriff, and in two hours Black Conway was in safe keeping. There was no trouhle ahout conviction this time, and the innocent cowpuncher went his way. Taking the hutler into their confidence and cajoling him into helping them, they go to the dinner as colored waiters. When the announcement is made, they exclaim, "Bless you, my children." The hoy slaps his father on the hack and the girl kisses her mother. Confusion follows in which they make their escape. The next morning, when the widower calls on the widow, the children enter, the girl dressed in her mother's clothes and the hoy in his father's. They hand a hundle to the widow and another to the widower, which contain the waiters' clothes, acknowledging they played the prank. BEWITCHED RUBBER SHOES.—This amusing comedy deals with the absentminded Professor Hart, who is so absorbed in his books and studies that his good wife is sadly tried while trying to keep her husband from committing all sorts of inexcusable blunders. At the opening of the story the professor sallies forth in the rain and manages to dispossess himself of one of his rubbers. While walking with an open book in his hand, the professor is hailed by a youngster who restores the lost rubber and receives a reward. But when the rubber is lost a second time, the Professor become annoyed and throws its mate into an alley. It is then that the fun starts. At almost every turn the Professor is confronted by someone who proffers him a rubber overshoe and in each instance the finder is suitably rewarded. As fast as he discards them they are returned, until in desperation the elderly gentleman decides to purchase a brand new pair and thereby save the reward money which he has been paying out for the old rubbers. With his new purchase he wends his way homeward in not the best of humor, and he prepares to spend the balance of the day at his studies. He is hardly seated when his wife is summoned to the door and she is presented with one of the old rubber shoes. When the Professor catches a glimpse of it be throws it out of the window and by mischance it strikes the helmet of a passing police officer. The latter bounds into the Professor's home and demands an explanation and is placated by the forgetful one. His patience sorely tried and his pocketbook sadly depleted by reason of his own carelessness, the old gentleman throws his collection of rubbers, old and new, into the stove and beats a hasty retreat while they are being consumed by fire.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 15 (April 7).

THE SNAP-SHOT (April 8).—His young and beautiful wife attracting so much attention at a ball, Dr. Ballincourt became so jealous that he decided to test his wife's love. Accordingly, he addressed a note in endearing terms to her, begging a smile, and signing himself A. D. T., care of General Delivery. Hs asked his friend, Paul McWilliams, a married man, to collect any replies to the note. Mrs. Ballincourt, anxious to learn the author of the note, employs a detective to take a snap-shot of the gentleman inquiring for letters addressed to A. D. T. While McWilliams and his wife are calling on Dr. Ballincourt and his wife the snap-shot arrives. It looks pretty bad for McWilliams and the situation is sure to provoke uproarious laughter. The difficulty is straightened out, however, and the men are forgiven by their better halves.

On the same reel:

THE RIVER CLYDE AT LANARK (Scotland).—A beautiful river in beautiful Scotland, beautifully colored.

TOO MUCH PARCEL POST (April 9).—William Jones, postman No. 1144, because of fifteen years' faithful service, is promoted to the new parcel post branch. He is highly delighted until he learns what he has to carry and deliver, the most peculiar combination of commodities conceivable. Eggs, dynamite, a stove, a goat, a baby carriage, a pig, a baby, and others too numerous to mention. On his route the eggs hatch out and the baby begins to scream. You can imagine the predicament of the poor parcel postman. A woman passerby objects to the manner in which he handles the baby and he runs before her torrent of abuse. When she corners him and strikes him the almost forgotten dynamite explodes. No wonder Jones resigned.

GOD IS LOVE (April 10).—This film is the enactment of Count Tolstoi's famous story of the Russian shoemaker who despaired of God's assistance in the time of his need. Grief-stricken by the death of his wife and child Ivan rages against fate's unkindness until a visitation opens his eyes and his heart to the truth. The Lord promises Ivan to visit him again and the shoemaker humbly awaits his coming. Several objects of charity cross Ivan's path. He treats them gently and generously and upon the return of the visitation learns that they were God Himself. The fact that the story is one of the most popular products of the pen of the famous Russian philosopher is a guarantee to the quality of the film and added to this the acting of a capable company leaves nothing to be desired to make an attractive offering.

THE ANALYSIS OF MOTION (April 11).—This is the most remarkable film that we have ever offered as it is an entirely new development in Cinematography. The camera, taking pictures at the almost incredible speed of twelve hundred per second, shows the trajectory of a bullet at a rate of speed reduced so as to enable spectators to witness just what takes place when the bullet leaves the gun, the course it describes through the air, how it strikes (a clay pipe in one experiment), and exactly what happens when it strikes this target. This film has set the scientists of Europe wondering at its possibilities, and even though it is scientific it keeps within the limits of everyone's understanding by means of clear, explanatory titles.

THE HAPPY HOME (April 12).—The wreck of the schooner Crusoe, when it is reported in the papers, deals a death blow to the dreams of Marion Clayton, for the man whom she was to marry was on board. Some time later William Hummel, a less favored suitor, renews his plea for Marion's hand and wins. Barton, meanwhile, has managed to live through the wreck of the Crusoe, and after several months he returns to the port from which the Crusoe sailed. There he learns of Marion's engagement to his rival. To find out if she has forgotten him and really loves his successor, he masquerades as a stranger. His adventure has a dramatic climax when he is forced to disclose his identity. However, it is by this incident that he learns that he is necessary to the happiness of Marion and the making of a happy home.

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC., LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Office—133 Third Avenue.

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, will hold their regular meeting on Monday, April 7, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex St., New York. The organization is progressing and sick benefits are under consideration. All operators should join this organization, for their own benefit and protection, as it is solely for the purpose of elevating their craft and bettering their condition, besides protection. Very soon, and probably by our next meeting, a death benefit will be taken up for consideration, and I personally think it a very good idea. Just think of belonging to a union that gives you what the M. P. M. O. U. of Greater New York, Local No. 1, gives to its members. Should you be out of work, you are guaranteed a steady position with union scale and conditions; if you are sick, you get the sick benefit, and in case of death your family will get a death benefit. For instance, let me state that our organization has five hundred members, and if a member dies, each member would be taxed fifty cents. That would give to the family of the deceased member $250.00. This is quite a benefit. I am sure that no operator would miss an opportunity of this kind to join the only Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Inc., Local No. 1, which gives you something that no other organization offers. Don't forget that you get what you are promised, and no ifs about it. Business at the office of the union is thriving, and there are more positions coming in than we can supply. All our members are working, and it is up to you, Mr. Operator, to think the matter over. If you are thinking of joining a union, don't put off until to-morrow what you can do to-day. The office of the union is open daily for applicants, and the business representative will be pleased to give any information.

RALPH J. KNASTER,
Business Representative.

Many editorials have been printed in this paper to benefit and warn the moving picture operator to take his profession seriously. The days when the little boy used to grind the picture machine in the store show are no more, and the entire industry has greatly advanced. To-day the operator must undergo an examination and get a license before he can enter a moving picture booth; he receives instructions from the electrical bureau as to what he should do when he enters a booth having violations, and is told to allow no persons in the operating room unless a licensed man. Surely the operator promises all, and when he gets that little card which entitles him to earn his living and, in many cases, for a wife and three or four little children, he flits away from that tall building on Park Row, New York City, his heart filled with joy on his good luck to be able to pass the examination, and the next day he is working in some picture theatre. The operator soon forgets how hard he worked before he was able to get his license, forgets all about the ones depending upon him for support and, worse still, he gets neglectful and calls on the reel boy to take the handle for a few minutes while he (the operator) takes a chance to steal a little smoke, and finally a great chance to endanger his livelihood, not telling what else can happen. These chances are taken regularly until the electrical inspector happens to come around and his card or license is revoked. Then the unfortunate operator wonders why he is persecuted and curses the inspector, who is in duty bound to look after the welfare of the public.

I have heard all kinds of complaints from operators that they are persecuted by the electrical inspectors, and I have visited many theatres to see if such conditions prevail. I am very sorry to state that what I have seen is surely a detriment to the business. This past week on entering several theatres I saw the operator standing in the aisle and a minor was in the booth operating the machine. On one occasion I asked the operator, "Who is running that machine?" "Oh, that's my brother; he's all right; I'm just taking a little rest." Now if I was one of those inspectors I undouhtedly would be a persecutor. However, the operator should think more of his profession than he does, and take no chances. Last Monday a theatre at 15 East Third Street, near the Bowery, advertised they were showing talking pictures and the latest invented talking picture machine. I entered the theatre and went to the booth. The manager of the shows was not on the premises, and no douht took a chance to open his show without an inspection of the electrical department. The operator who took the job that day started to work about three o'clock in the afternoon and took a desperate chance. I took one glance at the machine, then told the operator to stop work, and made an announcement to the audience that the matinee performance would be discontinued for the day. All passed out, wondering why this had happened and asking when the next show would be given. They were told the next show would hegin at seven o'clock, but the theatre was dark that night, and this is only one instance where exhibitor as well as the operator had taken a desperate chance.

Now I give the facts of the case and the reason that I took the liherty to stop that show. It was a breach of the law and a protection for the operator. A temporary booth was rigged up in such a way that you might as well have had no hooth at all. Then there was a Powers No. 5 machine that should have been in the junk pile long ago. There was no switch cover, no fire shield, the rheostat was on the wood floor, the booth was in such condition that I took the authority of closing down the place because I was positive that the electrical bureau was not notified to make an inspection, and I was also protecting the inspector of that district.

Ruby Feature Aids Flood Sufferers

The first of the moving picture fraternity to substantially answer the call of the flood-stricken territory in the Middle West is Leon J. Rubinstein, treasurer of the Ruby Feature Film Company, of 145 West 45th street. It has just become known that on receipt of the first authentic tidings from the flooded sections Mr. Rubinstein telegraphed every state right buyer in the country to this effect:

Every state in the Union is allowed three days' run of "The Gunmen of New York" at the expense of the Ruby Feature Film Company, provided the proceeds of these shows go toward the flood fund. The average feature rent per day of the theatre giving the benefit performance is accepted as the price of the service and three such amounts are donated to every state in the Union.

It will readily be seen that this means a donation of from twelve to fifteen hundred dollars, which Mr. Rubinstein is gladly proffering. This amount, however, is only what the state right buyers will get as an allowance on their films—it is their free booking. But the actual amount to go to the fund will be the proceeds from the performances which will amount to about ten thousand dollars. Unquestionably the fifteen hundred dollars out of Mr. Rubinstein's pocket does noble service in that it encourages benefit performances. The film service will cost the theatre man nothing; he gets his film free from the state right owner, who in turn gets it free from the Ruby Feature Film Company.

Power's Cameragraph Installations

Lyric Theatre, Ellendale, North Dakota, one Power's No. 6A complete with motor and new mechanical speed control, sold through General Film Company, Minneapolis.

The Riverside Theatre, 100th street and Broadway, has installed two Power's No. 6A with motor drive. This house holds one thousand people.

The Abbey, Prospect avenue near Westchester avenue, New York, has installed two Power's No. 6A with motor drive through the Picture Theatre Equipment Company.

FRANK E. WOODS, who has for seven months been producing comedies with the Kinemacolor Company, has joined the Universal forces and will from now on work from the Hollywood Studios. Mr. Woods was very well known as the editor of the Dramatic Mirror, with which magazine he was associated for seven years in various capacities. It was Mr. Woods who first created the moving picture department in the Mirror.

Mr. Woods has done a great deal of writing under the title of Spectator, and is largely known in moving picture circles by that pen name. He has been a prolific writer of scenarios in his time, and wrote the first serious picture drama that was ever produced in America. This was for Mr. Griffith of the Biograph.

THE MOTION PICTURE CENTER

For the first time in the history of the motion picture trade, it will be possible for the exhibitor to do all his purchasing under a single roof. No more wandering from building to building in search of the necessary supplies. A new projector can be bought and then the exhibitor stroll to a near by booth and arrange for new song slides or feature films of any desired company.

Within a few weeks, this innovation in the picture trade will be opened to the public. It is called the Motion Picture Center, Inc, and possesses many unusual features.- Occupying the entire sixth floor of the Heidelberg Building, its windows overlook Seventh Avenue, Broadway and Forty-Second Street, the very central point of theatrical activities in New York. The Times Square Subway station is across the street and within a short distance are the Grand Central and Pennsylvania Terminals, a fact which will appeal to the Suburban exhibitor.

The surroundings are artistic and luxurious, not at all what one would expect to find in the showroom of so many indispensable but often unsightly paraphernalia. The woodwork is finished in a tone of copper bronze, above which the walls are covered with mottle-green leather, the ceiling is painted an old ivory shade and there is a frieze of most appropriate design, representing a moving picture film, which extends the entire length of the room. From the ceiling are handsome electroliers and there are sixty booths for various concessions. These are six feet square and about three feet from the floor to permit sufficient light and air. They harmonize with the woodwork in the room and will be devoted only to exhibits related to the trade. In addition there will be writing rooms for the patrons; a telephone exchange; bureau of information, which will deal not only with motion picture subjects but will also give attention to less technical matters; a post office; catalogues of every conceivable branch of the industry; biographical department; in fact, experts will deal with almost every conceivable phase of the business. An interesting department will be that devoted to the topic so close to the heart of the exhibitor who has competition to consider and wishes to provide attractive premiums for his patrons. Everything from souvenir cards of popular players to Thanksgiving turkeys will be suggested and many ususual methods of filling empty picture houses will be outlined.

The originators of this new scheme for the co-operation of the manufacturer and the exhibitor, are men of long experience in the film and supply house business, backed by a concern, incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, for the purpose of rendering easier of access to the buyer, the products of the manufacturer in every line of the motion picture business. It is well known that in most occupations the prospective buyer can always purchase from samples. This has not been the case in the moving picture industry in the past, but a new era has arrived. There is promise of great success in this new undertaking, and the exhibitor need never be disappointed in what he buys. Even those unfamiliar with the business will rapidly become accustomed to the various appliances and the technical terms, so confusing at first.

Some of the concessions already arranged for are: moving picture machines of various makes; equipment and supplies to the smallest detail; arc lamps; carbons; screens; stereopticons; post card projectors; cameras; electric appliances; real estate office where sites for theatres as well as the theatres themselves will be sold or leased; an architect's office with the latest plans; decorator; furniture; tickets; equipment for studio and supplies; scenic properties and effects of different sorts; uniforms and costumes; musical instruments; premium department; theatre broker, and other lines allied to the motion picture business.

The struggling inventor will be given a chance, if his work is considered meritorious, and plans and estimates for printing and advertising will be prepared.

Within a few days the attention of all New York will be centred upon the Heidelberg Building. The forty-two windows are to have some wonderful advertising matter, and there will be displayed some unique signs telling of the new work. A huge searchlight operated from the windows will act reciprocally with one from the Auto Center, Inc., at Times Square and Broadway, directly opposite. Both concerns will be illumined at the same time and the effect will be startling.

Such is the scope of the Motion Picture Center, Inc., which marks a new epoch in the wide spreading industry devoted to the making, producing and projecting of the moving picture.

THE OPERATORS' FRIEND

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6A

A poor operator can ruin a good film in a good machine, and a skilful operator can be of great assistance to a poor film; BUT the best operator in the world cannot get perfect results without a perfect machine.

POWER'S NO. 6A is perfect in every particular. It is the product of 15 years' experience in moving picture machine manufacture. It possesses every known improvement, many of which it controls, and the pictures projected by it are absolutely clear and without flicker.

POWER'S IS KNOWN THROUGHOUT THE WORLD. Let's get acquainted.

A letter to DEPT. D will bring catalogue with full details.

THE LUBIN BASEBALL ASSOCIATION was formed on Saturday, March 29th. The following officers were elected: James J. Humphreys, president; R. J. Travers (Doc), secretary; Bennie from Lubinville, publicity. The meeting was largely attended and they would like to hear from all first-class teams, motion picture manufacturers preferred.

FRED BECK has just returned from Johnstown, Pa., and is leaving for the flood regions. He expects to be back in ten days with some of the finest views of the flood.

JOE ENGEL, of the Universal Film Company, is on a business trip to California. During his absence Raymond Hoadley, his assistant, is looking after the affairs of the sales department.

W. W. HINES, of the Kinemacolor Company, is in Boston looking after the interests of the company's Panama Canal and Balkan War pictures, which are now on exhibition under Mr. Hines' management. They are in good hands, as his many friends regard him as a clever manager and an affable gentleman.

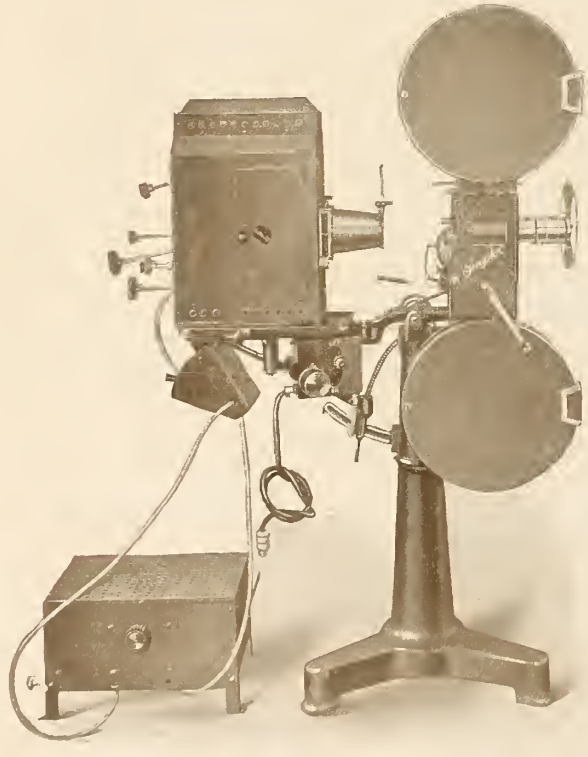
Simplex

INSPIRES THE OPERATORS TO POETICAL OUTBURSTS. WHAT OTHER MOTION PICTURE PROJECTOR CAN DO AS MUCH?

Look! cried the boss on the opening night,
Look at that picture, so steady and bright.
Sure! said the operator, all serene,
That's what to expect with the SIMPLEX machine.

The above contribution has been received from Mr. Kenneth G. MacLean, now of Yuma, Arizona, member of I. A. T. S. E., Local 150, of Los Angeles, and illustrates the operator's confidence in the Simplex.



We have previously advised the operators to get better acquainted with the Simplex. We now repeat that the Simplex means more to the operator than you now realize. It is a projector in the full sense of the word, and will be a lasting delight to the man who owns or runs one.

The Edison wins the crowd because it projects clear, flickerless pictures that don't tire the eyes and are a real pleasure to look at. There are no discouraging "Intermissions for repairs". EX-CATHEDRA

THE SHERMAN ANTI-TRUST LAW

HOW very strange, at this belated period in the history of Cinematography, the bugaboo of this law rises up before the heads of Departments. I often wonder why they did not think of this before. The special point I have in mind today, is the Kalem cry; when they supplied the Kinetograph Company with films, which under agreement and exclusive rights, they assigned to the General Film Company, giving them the absolute exclusive rights for the production of the "Land Swindlers." Action is brought against them by the General Film Company to restrain them selling to the Kinetograph Company. The question in my mind is, if they can do such contract breaking; why not supply the Independent exchanges under the same plea? It cuts both ways, and the argument is just as good on one side, as it is on the other.

Prominent people in the industry with whom I have been in conversation have raised the question several times, are not the Independents violating the Sherman Anti-Trust Laws by some of their tactics? I am not a legal luminary, but from a common sense point of view I sometimes question, if the case was brought before the Attorney General, whether he would find cause for action, against certain companies, or combinations of companies, who may, or may not, be formed with the main purpose of restricting trade. If they are not they certainly look as though they were. Take a case in point, the exchangemen have been holding meetings in New York, which so far, have proved almost fruitless. Agreements were put up to them for signatures which forbade them using any other brand of film except that manufactured by the various allied studios of this combine. If such combination of interests can tie up men in the manner they wish to, what was the good of fighting the combination formed by the Patents Company in its inception. If the Patents Company is illegal (which these men claim it is, why do they carry out the same tactics used by the Patents Company? Why are they plagiarists instead of originators? Some of the exchangemen told me that they cared nothing for agreements, that they were going on their sweet tenor of their ways doing as they pleased. This violation of contracts was one reason they were expelled from the Patents Company, and they are trying the same tactics now; for instance, one Chicago exchange buys every make of independent film on the market that he thinks is good for his customers, and the selection of his program is one of the finest to be obtained.

I understand an injunction is going to be lodged against this exchangeman for violating his agreement restraining him doing business with only certain brands of film. Is not this a violation of the Anti-Trust law? Is not this a question of restricting liberty of a man in his dealings, and restricting trade to a certain point, and is it not a violation of the law? If it is a violation, why is it not stopped? If it is not a violation, I will be glad to hear arguments pro and con for the position.

AN OPEN MARKET

Following the arguments I have above laid down it seems to me the only solution of the problem is an open market. I am fully aware that if an open market did come, many of the present manufacturers would soon be non est, and relegated where they ought to be; back to their shoe factories, their push carts, their second-hand clothing establishments, and other obscure positions in life. They are not fit to hold in their hands the key of a great industry like Cinematography, and an open market will be the means of either putting them on their mettle, and making men of them, instead of mere puppets as they are at present. It is perfectly appalling to see the mediocre condition of films and subjects that are foisted upon the trade today, all brought about by a cheese-paring policy, which is essentially "penny-wise and pound foolish." If some of these manufacturers instead of wasting so much money on printers' ink (giving false representation of their goods) would put the self same money into the salary of those they employ and for the production of a better class of writers, they and the public would very much benefit.

I have in mind a special artist who had one of the finest acts of the day and wished it filmed. He took it to one of the Napoleons of the industry, for his approval. He was kept waiting for an hour, and then an emissary was sent out to ask his business, having partially explained it to the attendant who went back to his master, he was again interviewed and asked the price for producing this. A sum was mentioned and carried back to the manufacturer, who replied, how much did you say it would cost? The sum was again named, and the attendant was told to go back to the man and ask if he could not accept half the sum mentioned. The man turned on his heel in disgust and left the office. He offered it to the one man for $500.00 (and this please remember was for a whole film 2,000 feet approximately, including elaborate stage setting), the result was, that another enterprising firm took the man and did not badger him down in price, but immediately offered him $2,000 for the same production which, of course, was accepted and will shortly be on the market as a leading feature film.

An open market would obviate a good deal of this, and instead of cheap films being placed on the market the highest class will be produced and placed upon their merits of quality, not quantity. Some of the manufacturers are getting out three and four reels a week, they are only able to produce one real good one in the course of five or six weeks interval. The pictures harp upon stories that have been filmed and refilmed over and over again. It would not be so bad if some originality was put into the work and some change in the whole, but no, the same lines are carried out as a child copies a line in its copy book. I might enumerate "Uncle Tom's Cabin" which Ed. Porter produced first, and which has been copied three times since and I understand is again to be placed on the market. This veteran also produced in conjunction with Rich. G. Hollaman the first Passion Play fifteen years ago. They also produced Parsifal, and some of the highest class photodramas which are being copied largely at the present time. An open market would make it impossible for a re-hash of these old subjects unless of the very highest class, with modern appliances, high class actors and actresses, and first class directors to put them on the stage again.

An open market would be the means of bringing out the very best of talent there is in manufacturer, producer, and scenario writer, and only the best would be shown, except in a few low place theatres which might as well be wiped off the map, as be allowed to exhibit the pirated and duped goods they are using today. It would also mean the elimination of the junk film exchange of which we certainly have no need. It would be the means of the manufacturers to get together, acting in unison and harmony, and as a Board of Censorship of each other's films, advising as to faults and uselessness of some that we see today. It would also enable us to see some of the best European productions. It is a well known fact that America cannot produce feature films under the present conditions that are worth being called features, except in a few instances where all the talent has specially been set apart for the production of some great master piece. The silly non-sensical, wild west, cowboy, Indian, and fight pictures are obsolete, and are only a re-hash of the old Deadwood Dick type of dime novels, and I do not wonder at the great cry going up for the suppression of such films as these. An open market would entirely obliterate these from the program of the exhibitor except in a few rare instances. An open market would also give some semblance of honesty among the manufacturers. Furthermore, they would be placed upon their merits to procure the best there is in the market of producers, directors, and scenario writers. It is one of the greatest hardships of the industry that any man should be debarred from showing the best production of every manufacturer, and that the exhibitor should be tied down to exhibit only such and such films, when down in his heart he wishes to exhibit others which are prohibited to him. The consequence is that he is trying to act according to what he wishes and yet becomes dishonest by fraudulent interpolation into his program films that his license prohibits, and the whole condition of the trade is creating suspicion, dishonesty, and sub-rosa tactics, which should never be called forth in so great and noble an industry as Cinematography.

Speaking with a prominent manufacturer on this matter he interpolated the remark that if an open market were formed it would be impossible to supply the theatres with a sufficient number of films to go around. He evidently sees the force of my remarks on survival of the fittest. My answer was, such an argument was absolutely absurd, and even if it did curtail the out-put, the public would be the gainer thereby, exhibitors all over the country would awaken to the fact that it is better to put on a program consisting of three or four reels of the best material, than it is to put on six or seven of some of the rubbish they are now exhibiting. A pure case of quality vs. quantity. It is a well known fact that Cincinnati was the pioneer of the three-reel show, and we well remember the remarks made by one who went to Cincinnati to open a theatre, "that he was going to show them what an exhibition was, he was going to let them have an eight reel show for a dime—bold words. When he got to Cincinnati he found he could not secure more than three reels for love nor money, that every exhibitor throughout the city was only using three reels, to occupy approximately an hour's show, for 5, 10, 20 or 25 cents according to house and locality. Following in their lead, there came along Cleveland, Columbus, Syracuse and Utica, whose exhibitors only use three reels for their exhibition. How much better it would be for cities like New York to follow this example and every theatre give a three reel program of the best obtainable.

The open market would soon solve this and give a selection upon its merits. It will be easy for the Exhibitors League of New York to get together and agree among themselves on such a program, saving money on their rental, and getting more patrons each day.

HON. JOHN J. LENTZ

By Alfred H. Saunders

The photograph herewith represents one of the men of today, Hon. John J. Lentz of Columbus, a former member of Congress. He is National President of the American Insurance Union. Mr. Lentz was unanimously re-elected National President of the American Insurance Union on the 13th of July, 1911, to serve until the 21st of September, 1914 which will make twenty years service as head of the A. I. U. He was the law partner of Gov. Geo. K. Nash from 1887 until the death of the governor in 1904.

The Hon. John is one of the men whom I esteem, and am proud to call "friend." He is the Counsellor of the National Exhibitors' League of America, a man of sterling qualities. All those who have heard him speak, wish to hear him again. His powers of oratory are unique. His advocacy of moving pictures as an educational factor is far ahead of any whom I have had the pleasure of listening to. Brother Lentz is a Fraternalist of the highest order. He is a man and a brother of humanity. To see him, is to be impressed with the greatness of his intellect, the largeness of his heart shows, as a result, the smallness of his pocketbook. He is a man of whom the Scriptures speak, "not letting his right hand know what his left hand does."

The moving picture as an educative power is being embodied in tangible form by him, inasmuch as he is one of the principal executive officers of the Loyal Order of Moose, who are building an university of one of the most advanced types it is possible to find anywhere the world over, and every Brother of the Moose is proud of the progress made in this instance. I want to quote Brother Lentz's speech of a short while ago where he advocated the work of the University and the simple means to be adopted whereby this can be made one of the greatest educational institutions known. Here followeth an excerpt from his speech:

HON. J. J. LENTZ

"There are enough fraternal orders of the stag school in this country, and if we are going to imitate those which have been organized prior to this one, each and every one of us could become identified with those organizations. They are all worthy of membership, and a good many of us are members of those other orders.

"The question is, however, are we to be imitators or creators? That is the question for the Loyal Order of Moose.

"Are we to lead or are we to follow? That is the question. Are we to capitalize the word progress or not? How happy we were in the great parade last night—one of the most magnificent demonstrations of a fraternity ever given in any city. It was given before one hundred thousand people who decorated and festooned, and who filled the sidewalks of this great city with manhood and womanhood superior in percentage and proportion to that of any city in the world, honoring you and me last night with an entire evening's demonstration. Why were they there? Idling that time away? No. We are being weighed in the balance, we are being tested. We are being examined. How do we compare with the other fraternal organizations? Not simply in our happy "Howdy Pap," but more particularly in the last letter of that great slogan, Progress. Progress in China gives them a republic; progress in Portugal gives them a republic; progress in France gives them a republic; progress in Germany gives them a constitutional monarchy, with a legislative body more progressive possibly than any in the world except our own.

"Progress is the spirit of the age. And in this, the beginning of the twentieth century, as members of the Loyal Order of Moose of the World, not that Loyal Order of Moose of the United States or Canada, but of the world, let us mean what we say, how can we do it with this educational institution?

"Now, brothers, you will go back home with some explanation, and I was sorry to hear the expression, $1.40. That is not correct. Your per capita has been reduced from 50 cents to 40 cents and you are asked to contribute annually $1 for the Moose University Home. Some of you have read of the gentleman, or heard of him, who reduced everything to units of beer. He didn't have a unit of a dollar, but it was always a glass of beer, and when his daughter wanted a piano he asked, 'How much will it cost?' She told him $500 and he said, 'Mein Gott in Himmel, that is ten thousand beers! You cannot have it.' So here you are asked to contribute the cost of five beers each quarter.

"God knows that this country cannot depend upon tomorrow if it looks only to the multimillionaire. There is nothing that robs the brain and the marrow, and mildews the soul as does luxury and sensuality. We must look for our manhood and womanhood in this great republic in the home of the men who do the work in the ranks, of such men as the Moose; and if we can by building an institution, and you can contribute your twenty-five cents each quarter, two cents a week, as has been so well said, do you think you will ever be sorry for it? Why, my friends, these officers have told you that we do not need so much money. This membership is growing so much larger, that there is a chance to make a still further reduction in the per capita tax in the future. But let us not go crawling like the beggar, asking help of the wealthy man. Let us do it ourselves.

"They say God hates a coward. So do you. We are not cowards. We turn our faces to the future and we pronounce the word 'Progress' and we mean it. And so when you go home to your lodge, and you understand this institution is to be a one-thousand acre proposition or more (not less), but more, and it should be so located that our boys and girls from Canada or from Honolulu or from Germany or from any other country to which we may spread in time, so that the institution may be in a position to develop, and to receive them, so that they may develop and project the buildings as their increased needs demand, and as their increased intelligence suggests.

"Now, my friends, let us not of the Moose be like the other fraternal orders. Let us not even stop to make a comparison. The men who are coming into this institution, the men who are giving us their sympathy and their support socially and morally, the one hundred thousand people who stood upon the sidewalk to witness the Loyal Order of Moose in its international convention assembled, in the Kansas City of the West, of the United States, let us demonstrate to them our worth and progressiveness by contributing one dollar a year for the educational establishment which will be a home for our children, and which will electrify the school system of their different communities, and I beg of you to make it unanimous, not in God's name, but in your name, as the followers and believers in the Loyal Order of Moose."

After perusing the above my readers must acknowledge that this is the most advanced fraternal organization in the world, and to which it is an honor to belong. On Sunday, the 30th of March, the Hon. J. J. Lentz, together with Hon. Champ Clark, Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Hon. Arthur H. Jones of Indianapolis, and the Hon. James J. Davis of Pittsburgh, were the speakers. The Hon. Judge O'Sullivan of New York was chairman of that meeting. As principal speaker Brother Lentz gave a most impassioned oration for moving pictures, stating that the Moose University would use pictures in every instance for the advancement of history, literature, art, and science, and the boys and girls of the Moose Fraternity would be taught through "eye-gate" in addition to "ear-gate." In conjunction with this I am divulging one of the secrets of the organization, but think I shall get exonerated by the impetus that it will give to moving pictures.

A contract has been signed with E. V. Ritchey of the Reliance Film Co. for an order of $20,000, which in all probability will become double and treble this amount before it is complete. I will have more to say about this in a future issue.

THE FILM INDUSTRY IN AMERICA TODAY

By Alfred H. Saunders

So many letters are coming from exhibitors in all parts of the country (especially in the Southern district), asking me to define for them the position of the trade to-day. I have answered, personally, many of these letters, but the volume is coming so thick and fast, that I want to go on record so that all readers of the News may be posted concerning present day conditions.

First of all, the Motion Picture Patents Company, organized for the purpose of protecting the patents of the Edison and Biograph Companies, the result of litigation between this company and the independents, is past history. Working through the Patents Company is the General Film Company, a distributing corporation for manufacturers who are licensed under the M. P. P. Co. and whose films they distribute; these comprise the following manufacturers: Biograph, 11 East 14th Street, New York; Edison Company, Orange, N. J.; Essanay Film Co., First National Bank Building, Chicago; Kalem Company, 325 West 23d St., New York; Lubin Manufacturing Co., 20th and Indiana Ave., Philadelphia; G. Melies, 204 East 38th St., New York; Pathe Freres, 1 Congress St., Jersey City, N. J.; Selig Polyscope Co., 20 E. Randolph St., Chicago; Vitagraph Film Co., 116 Nassau St., New York. In addition to these, George Kleine, 166 N. State St., Chicago, imports the Cines Films of Rome and the Urban Eclipse of Paris. There is also licensed the Famous Players Film Co., Times Bldg., New York. This practically comprises what is known as the Trust, a body of men standing together in one solid phalanx.

There are comprised in the Universal Film Co., owned and controlled practically by Carl Laemmle, with offices at the Mecca Bldg., 48th St. and Broadway, New York, the following brand of films: "101" Bison, Champion (Mark Dintenfass), Crystal (Erb & Golden), Eclair (Parisian manufacturers who also have studios in Fort Lee, N. J.), Frontier (The St. Louis Motion Picture Co., 25th and Montgomery Sts., St. Louis, Mo.), Gem, Imp, Mecca, Nestor, Powers Picture Plays, and Victor. In addition to these Carle Laemmle owns the Commercial Film Co., The World's Best Film Co., Industrial Moving Picture Co. of Chicago, the Paul Rainey Hunt Pictures (Jungle Film Co.), Top O' The World Motion Pictures taken by Beverly D. Dobbs, The Mecca Film Exchange, and the Laemmle Film Exchanges.

The Mutual Film Co. release the American Film Co., 6227 Evanston Ave., Chicago; Broncho (The New York Motion Picture Co., 1470 Broadway, New York, who also make the Keystone and Kay-Bee Films, also through the Mutual), Reliance, 540 West 21st St.; Majestic (same address); Excelsior, Punch, Thanhouser and Lux. They own and control some 15 or 20 exchanges.

The Film Supply Co. of America release Gaumont, Gaumont Weekly (studios and offices at Congress Ave., Flushing, N. Y.); Great Northern, 7 East 14th St., and Great Northern Special Feature Film Co., 42 East 14th St., New York; Pilot, 120 School St., Yonkers, N. Y.; Solax, Fort Lee, N. J.

Unassociated:

Ambrosio, 15 E. 26th street, New York.
Ramo, 102 W. 101st street, New York.
Ryno, City Island, New York.
Milano and Monopol, 145 W. 45th street, New York.
Warner Feature Films, 145 W. 45th street, New York.
Pathe Freres specials, Mr. Linn, 145 W. 45th street, New York.

In addition to these, there are several insignificant makers who are not worth mentioning, doing little or no business except promoting.

These are practically the whole of the film manufacturers and importers in the country, and at present are divided into five camps, and what will eventually evolve to is a very large problem, the distribution of these films among the 10,261 exhibitors in the country of whom 6,398 are taking licensed films, and 3,863 are divided among the independent companies.

Regarding the General Film Company and the Kinetograph Company, I am informed by Mr. Bushei and Mr. Percy Waters, respectively, that these are separate and independent companies working absolutely upon their own merits, each forming their own nucleus for the business and that there is absolutely no collusion or coercion between them.

A MOTION PICTURE DEPARTMENT STORE

This innovation is called the "Motion Picture Center" and is well located in the center of things in motion, namely, the Heidelberg building, at Broadway and Forty-second street, New York. An entire floor of the building, comprising 4,800 square feet, is given over to the displays and sales machinery of the store.

There are fifty-two booths of varying sizes, but each ample enough to display any product of direct interest to the exhibitor—motion picture machines, equipment, supplies, repair parts, arc lamps and carbons, slides, screens, stereopticons, motion picture cameras, camera supplies, electrical novelties, premiums, etc., building plans, architects' plans, decorating, furniture, tickets, studio equipment, studio supplies, scenic properties and effects, musical instruments and effects, theatre brokerage, booking agency, uniforms and costumes, post-card projectors, etc., etc. In addition their are sixteen display and show-cases.

The store will be open day and night. An emergency department will be at the service of any theatre calling for repair parts or assistance of any kind.

Briefly the idea is to bring manufacturer and exhibitor together upon a plane befitting the bigness and all-around needs of the motion picture industry.

For the manufacturer a showroom is provided in the heart of the metropolis, together with local and national advertising and competent sales methods.

For the exhibitor there is gathered upon a single floor everything he may need from architects' plans down to brass tacks. The projector of a new theatre can plan and equip his enterprise in every detail within the showroom, and if need be, by a single visit. The church, government, educational institution can find here what they want and any data or advice they need.

The idea of this novel venture belongs to H. A. Mackie, whose name as head of the H. A. Mackie Supply Company has become widely known to the motion picture trade.

"I began planning the store about four years ago," said Mr. Mackie. "I was looking ahead then, just as the Motion Picture Center is looking ahead now—to the tremendous, almost unbelievable possibilities of motion pictures.

"Almost every phase of this business has gone ahead of the sales supply end—but more particularly the manufacturing end has advanced away beyond us. Think of what is being done in the making of films and their production. The thing is too big to tell in a few words. But just consider the recent advance. Take, for instance, the big theatrical producers and their plans to begin next fall by filling the theatres of the country with several film productions weekly of successful dramas. Consider the future of the talking and natural color pictures in the great amusement world. And then grasp the great fact that the motion picture is destined soon to be the basis of educational work, of church work, of sales campaigns, of governmental bureaus, of social reform work, home life—perhaps even of the daily news.

"The present is great enough. It is almost impossible to grasp the future. But this has to do only with the inventive, manufacturing, exhibiting ends. The sales end has not progressed. Yet it is a big cog in the whole great wheel. The Motion Picture Center is the cog. That is the idea of it. The first department store was a collection of scattered shops. This department store provides shops which never before existed. It gives every manufacturer a New York retail store and address right in the new and big purchasing center.

"The first consideration in planning the store was the matter of location. I selected this as the center of the amusement and traveling end of the metropolis, the most convenient for the purchaser and at a place where ten to fifteen million people pass by each month.

"Then there was the organization of a big modern showroom with all necessary conveniences and appointments—the working out of details and side issues. For one thing we have tried to make the 'Center' attractive, so that it will appeal as a meeting place, a gossipy, comfortable as well as informative and practical place. A sort of 'meet me at the center' idea for everybody interested.

"We give the manufacturer or the man with services to sell, ample and attractive space in which to exhibit his wares. In addition we supply him with a New York address, a salesman, telephone, stenographic and mail service, the pulling power for his own goods of the wares of all the other exhibitors.

"This is a distinct advance in the selling end of the business. We have concentrated here under one roof all that a customer wants to buy. But the Motion Picture Center is to be more than a supply center. It is that primarily, but the big idea back of it is advertising.

"We propose, in other words, to bring customers here, customers of all kinds, from everywhere. I have spent more time and thought upon advertising than upon any other feature of the establishment. It is the big feature. We have mapped out a comprehensive, original campaign and will start things at once.

"The forty-two windows of the store will carry unique advertising displays and these will be illuminated at night by a huge searchlight acting reciprocatingly with another from the auto center at Times Square.

"I am particularly interested in the school and church side of the exhibiting business. Several contracts that I have secured by personal solicitation have shown me what can be accomplished by effective advertising. This field, I believe, with many others, is destined soon to be as great as the purely amusement end. It is just on the eve of development.

"The Motion Picture Center will also be a center for new patents and inventions. The bureau of information will be of great service to the exhibitors. We will be able to suggest ways of increasing the exhibitors' business, of meeting competition successfully. New schemes for making theatre interiors more attractive and of increasing attendance in every way will be constantly watched.

"We have under way a loose-leaf catalogue which will start with about 400 pages. Each manufacturer taking space may add to his pages the moment he brings out a new product. These catalogues will be widely distributed among the buying trade."

Comprehensive as the new venture is, Mr. Mackie is particularly well qualified to take executive charge of all its branches. He has had practical experience for many years in every branch of the motion picture business. He has been an exhibitor, owned a film exchange, created and managed a sales supply house, conducted advertising and promoted big contracts. He invented the first automatic stereopticon, and was for a year associated with Thos. E. Edison in the West Orange, N. J., laboratory.

"The first International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art," said Mr. Mackie in conclusion, "opens here at the Grand Central Palace on July 7th. It ends there July 12th. But we propose to continue this exposition right here in the Motion Picture Center. We will have here, in condensed form, every exhibit shown there, and some that were not, and we will have many more interesting and practical aids to the exhibitor—all the year around, and on a constantly increasing scale."

SCREEN CLUB BALL

One of the boxes at the Screen Club Ball will be set aside for use of celebrated cartoonists who have been invited to attend. It is expected that celebrities such as Cliff Sterrett, "Tad," "Bud," Powers, and others will be on hand and use their clever talents to portray the famous members of the profession who will be in attendance. Don't forget the date—April 19th, Terrace Garden.

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITION PROGRESS

It is getting too late in the game to finesse now. Manufacturers had better play their ace and get in or their competitor will get the odd.

It is expected that F. E. Samuels, who returns from London on Sunday, will take what little space there is left for foreign manufacturers.

President Neff, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, arrived in New York Monday morning after a most successful trip through the South. Exhibitors down there are strong for the league, and very enthusiastic about the convention and exposition.

Several parties have already been formed by exhibitors in Alabama to attend the big exposition. Most of the boys down there have never been in New York. They will find it is not such a murky burg after all.

Mutual Film Corporation have leased Theatre No. 1 on the mezzanine floor. The Mutual are planning for a big week.

Those who are under the illusion that this will be a small time affair are going to be greatly surprised when they look the big show over on July 7th.

The Nicholas Power Company have taken four more spaces, making eight in all. The Power's display of projection machines is bound to be an imposing one.

M. A. Singer, the well-known decorator, will erect a handsome reception booth in which to entertain his friends.

The Whyte Whitman Company will exhibit some new ideas in cameras.

Bausch & Lomb will be there with a complete line of lenses.

The Dramatic Mirror Company have joined the list of publishers who have taken booths in which to entertain their readers.

Menger & Ring are working on a lobby frame that promises to be attractive.

The H. W. Johns-Manville Company are going to install fireproof asbestos booths in all the theatres on the mezzanine floor of the Palace. Each of these booths will be of different design so that the motion picture exhibitor may choose for himself the one most suitable for his theatre.

Sam Trigger, the hustling president of the New York State Branch and the city local, returned from a trip up-state Tuesday. Mr. Trigger says the exhibitors will to a man attend the convention. It sure does look like a big time was going to be pulled off in the big town.

L. W. Woodward, of the Enterprise Optical Company, while in New York expressed himself as greatly pleased with the space rented for the "Motiograph Machine."

LILLIAN LANGTRY LOST

Has any one seen Lillian Lantry? She was to have appeared in a picture of the Famous Players' Company on Tuesday afternoon, at their studio, and was coming to New York from St. Louis by way of the flooded district. The suggestions in that she must have been help up somewhere there, for Ed Porter has been like one distracted, all the day searching in every hotel in New York asking for Lillian Langtry.

MISS JERRY GILL
Majestic Leading Lady transferred from Florida Company to New York Studio.

MR. L. A. WOODWARD, vice-president and general manager of the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Company, makers of the Motiograph, is spending several days at the Eastern offices of the Motiograph Company, 30 East Twenty-third street, and will be very glad to see any of the many friends of the Motiograph who might care to call.

The new lighting plant of the Ramo studios consists of seven overhead Cooper-Hewitt banks of eight tubes each, defused with three-quartz lamps, also five floor banks of eight tubes each.

Germany has passed a law compelling an actress to tell her right age. Some day they'll compel her to tell her real name and then the revolution will arrive.

* * * *

Five years ago the wiseacres said moving pictures were a fad and the end would come sooner or later. To-day the pictures are gaining in popularity right along. Those wiseacres overlooked a fundamental part of human nature for the first efforts of aboriginal man to express himself is by means of pictures. Picture representations of action have been part of the literature of all ages, as much as they have been developments of art. As long as man retains the semblance of his present nature, he will want to see pictures. There will be no end to the motion picture business. It means too much to the stay-at-home to be able to see the inauguration of President Wilson, the suffragette parade, scenes from the Balkan War, and the scenery of distant places at home and abroad, that he should cease to desire these vivid representations of actual happenings. Motion pictures are a providential gift. Let those who are developing the business take heed that they use them right and see that they are not made a force for harm.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

A Dissertation on Plots

THERE are some plots that ought to be retired on old-age pensions. They keep bobbing up serenely with a self-confident manner that would be funny—if it were not ludicrous. There is the plot of the persecuted working girl who is driven to the deepest depths of gloom by the machinations of the villain who hates her "steady." That plot is as old as Cinderella and nearly as overworked. There is the plot that consists of mislaid documents, worrysome mortgages, hidden deeds and buried treasure. Gloomy castles with underground passages leading anywhere, and the kind old servants who refuse to leave the ancient mansion. A goodly number of the stories of ancient Rome were based on these plots. Yet in this year of grace writers are not ashamed to drive a 2,000-year old hack abroad in the land. It's a shame. Then there is the hidden will; the stolen invention, the chase, the villainous gambler and the courageous cowboy. An old-age pension for many of the plots which are repeated with such studied regularity! A vacation is the most obvious need of some of these plots! But how such an action would cut into the income of many a "staff" writer!

"The Highest Prices"

"We pay the highest prices for split-reel comedy" is the statement of several producers. And yet when acceptable stuff is submitted $15 seems the top-notch price. A good split-reel comedy is worth $25 at the very least.

An Offer

If any one of the principals of corresponding "schools" will send us in a verified list of five scripts which he has written and had produced within two years past, we will gladly direct anxious students to him as "the one school principal who can practice what he preaches."

Titles and Sub-Titles

Titles and sub-titles are mong the artistic details of a picture play script. Great care should be taken with their preparation. As we have previously asserted, we think that an appropriate title for a script of prime importance. So is brevity and comprehensiveness important in preparing sub-titles or "leaders." Do not be stilted or awkward, get the knack of writing a sub-title with an appeal—a sub-title that tells something right from the shoulder, and tells it so all can understand. The sub-title is something like the combination that opens the door of a safe. Awaken expectancy and do not destroy it in sub-titling. Have the leaders free from grammatical blunders and pointedly and tersely lend color and interest to the picture. The right kind of sub-titles require care and thought.

Why Wade Around?

Why wade around in a flood of words? It is a weakness noticeable in more scripts than you would imagine. As in your sub-titles so in your text, be brief and to the point, and at the same time clear. Avoid unnecessary detail in writing scripts. When you describe, for instance, the "city room" of the metropolitan newspaper do not undertake to tell the editor and the director that:

> Scene 1—City room of a metropolitan newspaper office. Desks, chairs. Typewriters on desks and reporters seen hard at work. In one corner sits city editor blue penciling copy. Floor covered with newspapers. Scene of bustle and confusion.

The above is copied from a recent script we read. First, the writer was wading around in a flood of words. Secondly, he was drawing on his imagination as to the "city room" of a newspaper office. In up-to-date newspaper offices there is a scene of activity, but not of "confusion." Furthermore there are no old newspapers strewn around over the floor. Thirdly, not one newspaper editor in ten uses a "blue pencil" or sits in one corner of the "city room." Know what you are writing about before you write. But to brief up the scene, it could have been written like this:

> 1—City room metropolitan newspaper, shortly before press time.

To a director who knows his business this would indicate an active scene, and he could be depended upon to furnish the reporters, typewriters, etc., etc. Be brief and do not hide essential action under a cartload of trivial and unnecessary detail which half the time is wrong.

From All Sources

The Universal Film Company, according to a bulletin, has reorganized its editorial staff. The announcement follows:

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company has reorganized its scenario departments, both on the Pacific Coast, and at the general offices in New York City.

The departments, heretofore conducted under one head, will, by virtue of the new orders, be operated under separate managements. The present staff of scenario editors and rewrite men will be added to, and the total number of persons who henceforth will be engaged in the work of correcting, reading and editing picture plays will be nearly double the present number. A graduated scale of prices will be paid, the figures depending upon the worth of the particular scenario. Where considerable time is required in rewriting or editing the various manuscripts, the prices paid will necessarily be smaller than when picture plays require merely a preliminary reading before they are submitted to the directors of the several companies. Manuscripts are solicited from any and all sources.

Got a Sheepskin?

The very latest in the correspondence school course of play writing is "a handsomely engraved diploma awarded to our graduates at the end of their course. This diploma can be framed and will compare favorably with like certificates given by the larger universities." Can you beat this?

He Courts the Muse

Walter McNamara, staff writer for the Universal, is a poet—and a good one. Like other real good poets he does not find versifying remunerative.

Pertinent Pointers

Picture plays are not written but constructed. Have you constructive ability?

A picture play is the construction of happenings in words. The ideal script is done in self-explanatory action.

Appearances are deceitful in almost everything but the picture play manuscript.

You may sell the stolen idea once but be sure that your sins will find you out.

Your name and address is most important. It should appear at the top of the first page and also the bottom of the final page.

We know of one editorial desk that contains eighty-five scripts which bear no name or address. These writers probably think their work stolen.

If you are not sure what your script is worth to you why set a price on it?

Endeavor to select those plots which offer a single series of events or developments. The complicated plot is a common weakness.

Do not divide the action of a single scene into two, three or four parts. Have the scenes come in proper sequence.

A leader should never be used before the first scene. If a leader is necessary in the primary scene "break" it.

We think leaders or sub-titles interrupt the action and atmosphere of a play. Avoid leaders wherever possible.

On with the Banquet

A. W. Thomas, editor of the Photoplay Clearing House, and Ralph D. Stoddard, well-known author and editor, inform us that plans are progressing for a picture playwright feast, probably at Cleveland within a few weeks. It seemeth that the scribblers of the central West desire to hobnob and talk their troubles over. We understand that every lady and gentleman interested in the profession are to have open sesame. We will pass the good word along to all interested just as soon as we receive further details.

A New One

The Universal Company, House of a Thousand Ideas, has just sprung a new one. It is announced that F. Eugene Farnsworth, artist, traveler and lecturer, has been engaged to "supervise scenario editing and production." Maybe this is the job Giles R. Warren recently turned down.

A Philosophical Whack

Editor E. V. Brewster, who writes the entertaining "Photoplay Philosopher" department in the Motion Picture Story Magazine, deals Mr. L. S. McCloskey and ourself a gladsome whack in his magazine. Recently we published some illiterate letters that accompanied illiterate scripts to Editor McCloskey, of the Lubin Company. We have many of our own but published a few received by the Lubin Company to prove how the editors regard the average "school graduates." And now the Photoplay Philosopher argues that these little exhibits are not convincing. He asserts that "schools" are all right in their way. That may be but they do not weigh much with editors and critics, and it is bad business on the part of would-be writers to cater to them for this reason alone. Then, if the "schools" are so beneficial why do the majority of them stoop to the misleading advertisements they publish? "No education necessary," "A child can write them," "One hundred dollars paid for plots," etc, etc., are surely statements unfair to beginners and others. If Mr. Brewster has read a majority of the "courses of lessons" sold by these "institutes" and can support them, well and good. We have read a dozen or more of these "courses" so widely advertised, and cannot find much good in them. If Mr. Brewster has not studied these "lessons" we would request that he do so and then let us have his conclusions. If he so wishes we can furnish him with several bulky "courses of study" submitted us by disappointed writers. We have no axes to grind and argue against the "correspondence schools" because we are conscientious in our belief that the schools do not fulfill expectations.

A Proposition

Mr. F. Bufford, of Mobile, Ala., wishes to collaborate with some good script writer. Mr. Bufford says he is fertile in plot building.

Naming a Company

A Long Island City lady writes to know where the beginner "has the most chance." The beginner has the most chance with any old concern providing the beginner has the goods. By "the goods" we mean an unusual and logical idea—a good story. This good lady's letter shows that she is discouraged, and she believes the beginner has "no chance at all." Don't be a quitter. Every successful writer had to begin some time or other. Keep on writing; try to learn, and seek originality. Some day your ship will come in and you will be a "beginner" no longer—you will have arrived.

Western Stories

Untrained writers conceive the idea that Western stories are the easiest thing in the world to write. We cannot chide the beginner for this idea because some Westerns are certainly "wrong font." However, Westerns are not easy to write for the outside contributor. The Western "dope" ground out by the director, editor or staff writer on the spur of the moment is not the story that will be bought and paid for from the outside. It is difficult to get a new angle on a Western plot. Everything from the-bold-and-fearless-cowboy to the Noble Red Man has been done time and again—and done to a turn. Most of the Westerns submitted by new writers are weak or conventional, and their most noticeable details are the imitative quality. There is the "chase" the wicked Indian or Mexican, the colonel's daughter and the honest young man who goes West to roam the plains, or gravitates East to roam Broadway. Do not attempt Western stories unless you think you have "something different," and the chances are ten to one that you haven't. Some of these days manufacturers will awaken to the fact that the American audiences are sick and tired of Westerns and Civil War drama.

Yet to Be Written

In a recent issue of The Photoplay Author, Editor C. B. Hoadley gives some information worth repeating. He writes: "Motion picture directors like stories with a 'punch' as a rule. The definition of the coined word as applied to pictures is rarely understood by the novice. One big situation will sometimes save a play, and that situation must be led up to and be presented in a strongly dramatic finale, the logical and poetic culmination of the tale. If a story has two 'punches' it has more value, but the story with a 'kick' in every sense has yet to be written. Remember that motion pictures are just what they purport to be—photographs of actual events, produced by real scenes, augmented by those little tricks of stage craft that make the situations faithful and true."

The "one punch" story—the yarn with the well-developed and carefully led up to "big break" is the story for the beginner. The "two-punch" story may or may not come later with added experience and cultivated talent and dramatic sense. Mr. Hoadley has written some scripts with the anteclimax or "snapper" cleverly developed. However, the pioneer or the "two-punch" plot is none other than Giles R. Warren. When you see a Warren picture keep an eye out for the second climax. Its almost certain to come.

JOHN B. CLYMER RESIGNS FROM GAUMONT COMPANY

John B. Clymer, manager of advertising and sales, of the Gaumont Company, has resigned, having been retained by a leading magazine to conduct investigations for a series of articles on municipal conditions. At the conclusion of the time needed for this work he will return to the film business.

Mr. Clymer entered the motion picture industry from the newspaper business. He has been connected with the New York Herald, Globe, Morning Telegraph, Sun and Philadelphia Record. He has also performed publicity work for large corporations, having been New York manager of the bureau conducting publicity for the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway, the Norfolk and Western Railway, the Old Dominion Steamship Line and Frank Jay Gould.

JOHN B. CLYMER

JACK KERRIGAN turned rescuer with a vengeance last week, when a wee two-year-old child wandered into the American's studio at Santa Barbara. Jack Kerrigan acted as combined parent for over two hours, hurrying up and down the streets until the frantic mother was found. Jack's friends insist that the child, being of the feminine gender, wandered in to see him, but Jack doesn't believe this.

ALLAN DWAM, in charge of the Western studio of the American Film Mfg. Company, drove into Santa Barbara last week with his new $6,000 Simplex 90-horsepower roadster. It is white, has splendid lines and will be used by Mr. Dwam in scouting about for locations.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Keystone

"Murphy's I O U" and "A Dollar Did It" on the farce-comedy order appealed to the writer somewhat more than this class of goods usually does.

"A Fishy Affair" also has its merits as a laugh getter, and "A Life in the Balance" is unique in its comedy.

Kay-Bee

"A Runaway Pair" has fair comedy merits, and is warranted to tickle the comedy vein of any audience.

"A Black Conspiracy" might be termed quaint in the action and development of the story. The comedy element is very good.

Broncho

"Retrogression" is a particularly strong drama. The plot is full of interest, and is developed in the production in such manner as to completely absorb the attention of the onlooker.

Selig

"Arabia, the Equine Detective" features a beautiful white horse around whose clever tricks the story centres. This is a very interesting piece of work.

Vitagraph

"Our Coast Defenders" is a revelation in gun manipulation. It is interesting to note the splendid and efficient manner in which our coast would be defended should the necessity arise.

"The Midget's Romance" on the same reel in which the lead is played by a dear little boy, is clever throughout, unique in type, and splendidly played and produced.

"The Golden Hoard, or Buried Alive" is one of the best two-reel dramas recently produced. The plot is strong, and a high standard in production has been aimed at by the director, whose careful staging of the story has accomplished the point. The only derogatory comment offered by the writer is that the story as it is filmed is in part nerve-racking.

Lubin

"The Burden Bearer" with Arthur Johnson in the lead is most excellent. The dramatic situations are tense, and needless to say, the work of development and interpretation is good.

Pathe

"An Excursion to the Grande Chartreuse, France," is a beautiful scenic, well worth the seeing.

"Whiffles Tries Moving Picture Acting." In this film the Pathe players have done excellent work. The comedy here is exceptionally good.

Imp

"Blood Will Tell," with Herbert Brenan and William Shay in the leads, is particularly commendable for its careful production. The female lead also does fine work in this picture.

Melies

"The River Whanganui, New Zealand," is not only a beautiful scenic, but is interesting as an educational or travel subject.

"A Stolen Tribute to the King," also from Melies, is interesting as having been produced in Tahiti. The plot of the story is not specially strong, but has been handled in such a manner as to make it interesting.

Biograph

"The Hero of Little Italy" is a strong melodrama in which the chief object of production has been gained, for it inspires the deepest interest and holds the audience in breathless suspense.

Essanay

"The Will-Be-Weds" is a most excellent comedy. The players have entered into the spirit of the thing with rare good humor.

Powers

"The Fear" has special merits as a drama. It is a simple story in which two brothers quarrel over the shooting of a rabbit. The result being that one brother knocks the other unconscious, and believing that he has killed him, flees, consumed by a terrible fear. He is found almost fainting from exhaustion by his wife, and is brought back to a happy reconciliation. There is a good lesson in this film for the hasty tempered.

"The Lesson," a child story in which Early and Mattie, of the Powers Company, entertain us with their clever work is excellent. It is a comedy-drama in which the children steal grandma's pies, and in punishment therefor, are forced to eat all of them at one sitting.

Eclair

"Going for Father" is a fair comedy, something on the farce order, and is truly laughable.

"The Octopus" brings some of us back to the schoolday period of our lives, when we revelled in the wonderful story of the Devil Fish culled from Victor Hugo's "Toilers of the Sea." This film gives an excellent portrayal of this obnoxious demon of the deep, showing his haunts and habits.

Nestor

"An Affray of Honor" is a very fair comedy, which also leans farceward—a very good sample of this type.

Rex

"Robinson Crusoe" is a film that is destined to much popularity. The schoolboy will fairly revel in the realistic romanticism of this production.

"A Friend of the Family" shows, with interesting realism, the opposite natures of two men, one the cowardly weakling, and the other the manly nature that we love.

Kalem

"New York Public Markets" is instructive even to some New Yorkers, and is specially interesting for the theatres outside of the great city.

"Fatty's Deception" is an absolute scream—one of the funniest comedies we have seen for a long time. Its popularity is assured.

Edison

"Old Jim," as a story" has its hold in the tensity of its situations. The plot is very clearly defined in the production, and it may be truthfully said that the suspense caused by the wandering of the child near the lighted fuse, and her rescue scarcely a second previous to the explosion is almost too much of a nerve strain.

Ramo

"Love and Gold" is very good indeed, and special mention should be made of the choice of location for exterior scenes, and the beautiful photographic work of which this film is an example. Another point of merit is in many cases the artistic effect arrived at through focusing the camera at a certain angle.

101 Bison

"War" has a fair story, with one or two original touches in the production, namely, the reflection in the mirror of the battle scene which is taking place on the hills opposite, and the battle on the banks of the stream where the dead and wounded soldiers fall headlong in the water. There are, however, a few discrepancies in this picture which might have been avoided, for instance, nurses in modern costume.

Victor

"The Coward's Charm" has an excellent moral. "You're a coward because you believe you're a coward." Boys and girls, too, might see this film and benefit much by its lesson, which, however, might have been given a stronger illustration.

Frontier

"Some Doings at Lonesome Ranch," although it may appear screamingly funny to some, has its comedy basis on two afflictions which are at all times most unhappy, the harelip and the cross-eye. Can we not find comedy subjects enough without ridiculing the afflicted?

HIAWATHA AT THE AMERICAN MUSEUM OF NATURAL HISTORY

The picture mask "Hiawatha," in which the characters are Indians, was given at the American Museum of Natural History, on the evening of April 3rd, under the joint auspices of the American Scenic Society.

The immense big auditorium was crowded with a great audience of prominent New Yorkers. Several hundred seeking admission were turned away, as every seat was taken before the time set for the projection.

Robert S. Pigott, formerly of the University of Toronto, recited the poem as the various scenes were projected on the screen.

THE WOMAN WHO KNEW

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Reliance Release.)

MRS. BEECHER had been sitting at the breakfast table alone for half an hour. Now and then she glanced at the clock on the mantle as she slowly sipped her coffee.

"Did you call Mister Harry again, Jane?" she asked the maid who came in to see if she needed anything.

"Yes, m'am, I knocked on his door twice but he didn't answer me at all. He usually makes some sort of noise."

"Never mind, Jane," she sighed, "if he doesn't come soon I'll go myself."

It was not the first time Mrs. Beecher had waited breakfast for her son, but this morning he was unusually late, and so she had more time to think. And to think was the last thing she wanted to do.

Leaving the most of her breakfast untouched she went slowly up stairs to the door of her son's room. There she knocked and waited, and knocked again. No answer came. She opened the door and entered the room. The bed was untouched and everything in the room just as it had been when she looked in before going to her own room the night before.

"Oh, my son, my son," she whispered brokenly. "You promised me you would never stay away another night."

Going to the desk the mother took two photographs and stood comparing them.

"How like they are," she said, "how very like. You have the same beautiful eyes and the same weak mouth and chin your father had. My poor boy!"

A sound behind her caused Mrs. Beecher to turn. A young man stood looking at her. He was pale and his eyes were bloodshot. His full lips were very red and dry.

"Well, mother, what have you to say to me?" he asked hesitatingly.

"Nothing. There is nothing to say that I have not said."

"I broke my promise to you."

"Yes. That, too, has happened before."

The son took off his hat and coat and then turned to the mother.

"I had great provocation this time, mother."

"Yes?" wearily.

"Will you let me tell you what it was?"

"Oh, yes, tell me."

"I have been intending to tell you of my engagement to Eva Martin," he began. "We have been engaged for a month. Last night she gave me back my ring."

The young man turned away to hide the tears he could not control.

The mother gave him time to get himself in hand and then she said in a voice that was gentle, but which made her son shrink, "Why did she break the engagement?"

He did not answer nor look at her.

"Did she see you intoxicated?"

He bowed his head.

"Did you go to her home in that condition Harry?"

"How did you know?'" he asked quickly.

"How did I know! How did I know!" cried the mother. She held out the pictures still in her hand. "How should I know?"

"Look at these pictures, Harry," she continued, handing them to him. "See how much like your father you look. You know what he was—you were old enough to remember—and you are following in his footsteps. Oh, my boy, my boy. Can't you stop now before it is too late? Show this girl you love that you are a man and can control yourself like a man, and if she loves you she will take you back."

The young man dropped on his knees at his mother's feet and buried his face in the folds of her gown.

"Oh, mother, help me to win her back," he cried. "I must have her. I love her so."

"Your father said that he loved me. Do you think he showed his love?"

"Mother," said Harry solemnly, "I will stop drinking. I swear to you and to God that I will."

With tears in her eyes the mother placed her hand on the bowed head. "If you only could, my boy, if you only could!"

"If I do will you promise to intercede for me with Eva?"

"Yes, dear, I will do anything in the world for you if you do that. Oh, be strong, my child, be strong. You can. I know you can if you only believe you can, and want to, strongly enough."

The mother stooped and raised her son to his feet. "You promise on your sacred honor?" she asked looking into his beautiful boyish eyes.

He raised her hand to his lips. "I promise, mother," he answered. "But without you I would have no strength at all."

The mother's heart was heavy, and yet hope beat dully there, when she went that afternoon to see Eva Martin.

"I am Harry Beecher's mother," she began simply, when the girl came into the parlor. "He tells me that you have broken your engagement."

"Yes."

"He told me why."

"Oh, I'm glad he did that," cried the girl, her eyes filling with tears.

"Come, sit down here beside me and let us talk as mother and daughter." She drew the girl to a sofa and there sat holding her hands.

"My boy has promised me that he will reform. He has sworn it. Will you reconsider your decision?"

The girl dropped her eyes from the kind weary eyes before her to the wrinkled hands holding her own.

"Oh, I wish I could for your sake, Mrs. Beecher," she answered in a low voice.

"You love him still?" asked the mother gently.

"Yes, oh, yes, so much!"

"Harry loves you. You must know how much. And love is as necessary to him as the air he breathes. He has promised to reform. Will you not take him to your heart again?"

"I am afraid Mrs. Beecher, I am afraid!" cried the girl. "Oh, this is not a whim. I have thought of it before. I knew that Harry drank, but I had never seen him before as he was last night. I have thought and thought about it. I know I could not cease to love him, but there is one thought that haunts me—tell me, Mrs. Beecher, wouldn't it be a terrible thing for a woman to lose respect for a man and yet to go on loving him? That is what haunts me."

The older woman turned away her eyes for a moment. "Yes," she said slowly, "it would be a terrible thing."

The young girl was fighting desperately with herself. It was a choice of unhappiness now or probably greater unhappiness in the future. She closed her eyes for a moment, and leaned her head against the back of the sofa.

When at last she looked at Mrs. Beecher she was pale and calm. "No," she said. "I cannot do it. I do not dare. I am afraid. I—I—love him too much."

"I am sorry," was all Mrs. Beecher said.

Slowly and sorrowfully the mother returned to her home and her waiting boy. How could she tell him? What would he do? Would he blame her? Oh, if the girl had only changed her mind!

"Mother! She will not take me back!" Harry cried when Mrs. Beecher entered the library. "I know by your face! Oh, mother, tell me I am mistaken."

"No, my son, you are not mistaken. Would to God I could say you are. I would bear this sorrow and more for you, Harry, for I love you. Oh, my boy, my boy, how my mother's heart aches for you."

"There is no hope at all?" he asked helplessly.

"She says she can not."

Harry moved restlessly around the room for a time. Then he said in a voice that was almost hard, "I'm going to my room. It will be a fight."

"Remember your promise," pleaded the mother.

"Oh, I remember the promise but I don't know how much good that will do."

Back and forth over her head the mother heard him walking. She dare not go to him, for experience had taught her he was best alone.

After an hour had passed the walking stopped and she heard nothing for several minutes. Then the front door slammed. She ran to the window just in time to see Harry rapidly turn the corner.

"Oh, my poor boy," she moaned, "my poor weak boy."

Mrs. Beecher sat lost in her own sad thoughts until a tap at the library door recalled her.

A maid handed her a note. She opened it and read:

"Dear Mrs. Beecher:—

"The pain of parting seems almost too great. If you can tell me that you truly believe I may trust my life's happiness to your son I will marry him. If you cannot tell me this do not give yourself the pain of answering. I will understand.

"Most sincerely, EVA MARTIN."

Mrs. Beecher sighed deeply. "Oh, she may save him yet." She took a pen and sat with it poised above a sheet of paper. Then she wrote:

"My Dear Miss Martin:—

"Since our talk this afternoon I feel as though I want to call you Eva.

"Your note has made me very——"

She stopped. Her ruined youth rose up before her to stay her hand. Her mind went back over the years, and one by one the pictures were seen. She must look at them. She could not help it. The lonely meals, the anxious nights, the pleadings, the disgust—and the love; they all came back to her. She remembered Eva's question: "Wouldn't it be a terrible thing for a woman to lose respect for a man and yet to go on loving him?" Oh, yes, how terrible! That was what she had done. She had loved so deeply that nothing could kill that love. It was bruised and crushed, but it could not die. In her young wifehood she has known things that no young wife should know, things that had torn her very soul.

All this she thought of. And she thought of the young and loving girl who was trusting in her. Against this she weighed the love of her boy. He had come to her when the flower of her love was still fresh and in her mind she had always connected him with its purity.

She read the girl's note again. "If you can tell me that you truly believe I may trust my life's happiness to your son." The words stood out like letters of fire. "My boy, forgive me," she sobbed, and slowly tore the note she had commenced.

HORACE G. PLIMPTON

I wended my way to the Edison Studios one of the days last week to interview Mr. Plimpton, and, figuratively, to pick his brains regarding the trade abroad. I gave my readers a little notice prior to his sailing stating that he had gone to combine a business with a pleasure trip. In the interview I had with him it turned out that it was more business than pleasure, although he was able to extract a little of the latter during his stay abroad. Mr. Plimpton is an enthusiast for the elevated picture story, and it was with a view to ascertain for himself conditions abroad regarding the agencies for the Edison films, and also to see what the European studios were turning out that he paid Europe a visit.

Mr. Plimpton informed me that he was away from the studio six weeks, but owing to delays going, and delays with the Continental railroads, it only left him practically sixteen days in which to do all that was in his mind. Of these sixteen days he spent four in London, four in Berlin, four in Paris, again two in London, and two in its environs. He had interviews with many people while there. His impression of the people abroad was that they were taking the moving pictures more seriously than we do here, if such a thing is possible.

There, theatres were more stately, and more in the nature of palaces of art than are generally found here. Again, the music was taken greater care of than some of the pianists here think of doing. Oftentimes the music is provided by a well-trained orchestra. One special theatre Mr. Plimpton had in mind was the gorgeous Gaumont Palace of Paris. It is in his opinion the most sumptuous and the most elaborate theatre extant, with a seating capacity of 6,000. Said he: "I must also give a word of praise to the projection of the pictures, which in my opinion was the finest I have ever seen. Admission to this place was 5 francs per seat, in boxes, with every comfort, even down to the 50 centime seats. This theatre always had one of their feature films going, and their color pictures were wonderful." Mr. Plimpton was well satisfied with his visit, and the increase of business to the Edison Company, on the whole, made it a very successful and satisfactory trip. He reported that all the agencies were doing a high class business and that the American makes of films were largely in evidence all through Europe. He spoke in reference to the manufacture of feature films and remarked that the Europeans were able to produce films with a greater degree of brilliancy, color and atmosphere; this, in addition to the original places and the number of castles, abbeys, and such like backgrounds, made it possible to secure what in modern America with its newness was an impossibility. He made special reference to the picture "Quo Vadis" of the Cines Company, who used the old Coliseum at Rome as the amphitheatre of their photography and acting. He said that the scenery, the actors and surroundings were absolutely perfect and lifelike. (Incidentally I may say here that this picture will be released by George Kleine of Chicago and if it impresses Mr. Plimpton as it does, I am more than anxious to see for myself the beauty of this film.) Mr. Plimpton said that he had very high ideals regarding the pictures turned out by the Edison Company, and it made him more than ever earnest to obtain only the highest class of results.

Mr. Plimpton is ably assisted by our old friend, John Hardin, who is installed as Assistant Manager of the Edison Studio and who is looking well after the production and seeing to it that the pinnacle of perfection is reached. Every member of the profession will join with me in wishing Mr. Hardin every success in the enterprise. A. H. S.

THE BATTLE OF THE LONG SAULT
(British-American Film Co.)

The British American Film Co., a Canadian firm with headquarters at Montreal, and one of the more recently incorporated organizations, has evidently profited by the experience of others, judging from the quality of their first release, a two-reeler entitled "The Battle of the Long Sault." This picture, which gives what appears to be a most authentic idea of the early days of the French in Canada, when Henri Dupre apprised the villagers of the approach of the hostile Iroquois Indians, and called upon the friendly Algonquins for aid.

This film is delightful in many respects. The genuine red man has been pressed into service in its preparation, and the river scenes where the Indians approach rapidly and numerously in their canoes, creep over the ground and through the underbrush, aiming flights of arrows at the stockade of the French, realistic in action and atmosphere.

One of the commendable points of this film is the smoothness of its development. There is a dignity and deliberation about the action of the piece that is good to see, and altogether it is one of the most satisfactory of states rights propositions.

The British American films, known as the "Briam," will be represented in the United States by Mr. Joe Farnum, formerly of the Morning Telegraph and later with the Film Supply Co. of America.

NEW INSTALLATIONS BY HALLBERG

J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," reports the sale of Edison Model B and complete Economizer equipment to W. H. Voight, Long Eddy, N. Y. He has also sold complete Power's No. 6A machine to Andrew P. Mikkelson, Mt. Pleasant Theatre, Pleasantville, N. Y.

Max L. Livingston, Mr. Hallberg's representative, who is traveling in the West has been very successful in the sale of the "Hallberg" Ticket Dispenser, having placed a large number in various theatres. He has also established new and important agencies for Mr. Hallberg in the sale of the Simplex, Power's and Motiograph machines and the Hallberg line of Economizers, the A. C. to D. C. outfit being especially prominent.

WEST VIRGINIA STATE BRANCH No. 6 OF THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

The Moving Picture News,
New York City.

Gentlemen: We beg to advise you that owing to the disastrous flood which has visited this section of the country, the last two weeks, and inasmuch as a great many exhibitors' theatres, throughout Ohio and West Virginia, have been more or less damaged, we, the Convention Committee, have decided to postpone the convention until April 29th and 30th.

We have heard from a great many exhibitors and they state that they could surely attend the convention if we would postpone the convention, and would change the publication of date of the convention, which would be held on the 29th and 30th positively.

A great many manufacturers of moving picture appurtenances have contracted for space at this convention, which will be of extreme interest to visiting exhibitors.

Asking that you give this change of date as much publicity as possible, and thanking you for the favor, we remain the U. S. Patent Office it is a sad fact that compensation for official services is absurdly inadequate as compared with the requisite qualifications, etc., and far below the salaries paid foreign officials for similar services. Thus, notwithstanding the higher cost of living in Washington over that in London, our Commissioner only receives $5,000 a year, whereas the British Comptroller gets fifty per cent. more, or an income equivalent to $7,500 a year. Here, the Assistant Commissioner receives $4,500, while in England the Chief Examiner receives $6,000. The British Chief Clerk has a salary of $5,000 as against $3,000 paid our Chief Clerk. Four Supervising British Examiners are paid $4,100 each, while our three Examiners in Chief receive $4,000 each, the only comparison approximately equitable. The thirty Principal Examiners in the English office receive a yearly salary equivalent to $3,400 each, while our forty-three Principal Examiners receive only $2,700 each. Their Register of Trade Marks is paid $5,500 as against $2,700 paid our Examiner of Trade Marks, etc., and so on down the list, notwithstanding our surplus of approximately $8,000,000 in the U. S. Treasury to the credit of our Patent Office. The British may be "penny wise and pound foolish," but we "spare at the spigot and spill at the bung." Salaries in our Patent Office ought to be commensurate with the expert skill and intelligence required, as in no other Department of our Government. Certainly the capacity and output of our Patent Office is of greater national importance than that of New Town Creek, and worthy of an "appropriate" appropriation.

Very truly yours,

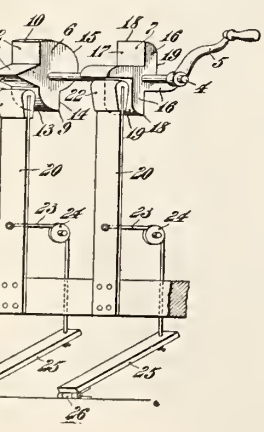
☞ Apropos, 693 Patents, Trade Marks, etc., issued last week.

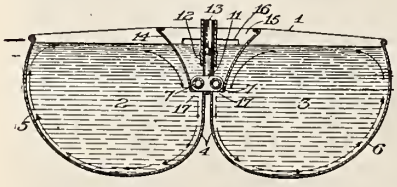
Horses are frequently an important factor in motion pictures, and coincident with their appearance on the screen the sound of their hoofs (presumably) may be frequently heard, more or less realistic, according to the skill or inclination of the general utility artist in the orchestra. In Letters Patent No. 1,052,185 Ira L. Singer seeks to render these "noises" more accurate, while providing for various effects. In the accompanying perspective view a horizontal shaft 4, mounted in suitable journals not shown is provided with an operating hand crank 5. Mounted on the shaft 4 are two main operating elements 6 and 7. The member 6 comprises a block having three peripheral edges 8, 9 and 10, circumferentially spaced to produce a noise similar to that of a trotting horse. The edge 8 forms the limiting margin or the line of intersection of the side surfaces of a V shaped extension of the member 6, from which side surfaces a surface 12 extends on one side in a direction tangent to the base of the V shaped portion 11 while on the other side thereof a surface 13 extends in curvilinear direction to the edge 9, from whence it extends as at 14 in a plane substantially parallel to that of the surface 12 and thence by a substantially involute curve 15 to the edge 10 which forms the outer margin of surface 12. The member 7 comprises a block somewhat similar to member 6 but having four symmetrically spaced arms 16, each having a radial surface 17 which terminates in the outer marginal edge 18 and the other surface 19 of each arm extends from the surface 17 of the adjoining arm, curving at its outer portion to the outer marginal edge 18. Mounted in front of each of the rotatable members 6 and 7 is a slap stick 20 rigidly secured at its lower end to a stationary part 21. The outer free end of each slap stick 20 is provided with a pad 22 for producing the desired sound. A strap 23 is secured to the slap stick 20 and runs over a suitably arranged pulley 24 to the free end of a foot treadle 25, the other end of which is hinged as at 26. By rotating the shaft 4 with greater or less rapidity and by depressing the treadles 25 to a greater or less extent and either separately or in unison, a variety of effects can be produced under the easy control of the operator.



The Societe Francaise des Films et Cinematographics Eclair, of New York City, has applied for the registration of the subjoined Trade Mark for Moving Picture Films, used since October 1st, 1912.

According to the new rules of the Treasury Department, a piratical motion picture film is defined as follows: A film, which constitutes either an actual copy or a substantial reproduction of a legally copyrighted film produced and imported in violation of the rights of the copyright proprietor. Collectors will admit imported films concerning which some party in interest alleges an adverse copyright or where the adverse claim amounts to nothing more than an allegation of infringement of copyright. In such cases the claimants are relegated to the courts. Entry to imported films will be refused if (a) representations are made that they are piratical copies and such representations are not denied by the importers, or (b) if the collector is satisfied they do, in fact, constitute piratical copies as above defined."

"It is only when the brain evolves and the cunning hand fashions labor-saving machines that a nation begins to throb with new energy and life and expands with a new growth." Thus spoke Senator Platt of Connecticut, the best posted legislator as to inventions and patents the country has ever known, who also said on the Senate floor that the passage of the Act of 1836 creating the Patent Office marked to his mind the most important epoch in the history of our development.



The accompanying illustration shows a transverse section of an improved Photographic-print washer invented by John A. Robertson, who assigns the patent, No. 1,053,223, to the Eastman Kodak Corporation. The object is an arrangement of parts whereby the prints are constantly subjected to a fresh stream of water and are kept moving, being prevented from lodging at any one point and from clogging either the incoming or outgoing stream. 1 is a sheet metal container formed with semi-cylindrical chambers 2 and 3, the inner adjacent walls thereof forming a central partition the top of which is below the edges of the outer walls 5 and 6 and below the water level. 7, 7, are parallel perforated discharge nozzles, connected by coupling 11 and nipple 12 with the fluid supply pipe 13. 14, 14 are baffle plates which deflect the prints downward as they circulate continuously as indicated by the arrows, the nozzles discharging through the passages 17-17 between said baffle plates and the walls 4. 15 is the overflow chamber and 16 the overflow opening. The prints to be treated are simply thrown into the chambers, whereupon they revolve about in the constantly freshened bodies of water, being turned over and over in the process and prevented from adhering either to each other or to the walls of the container.

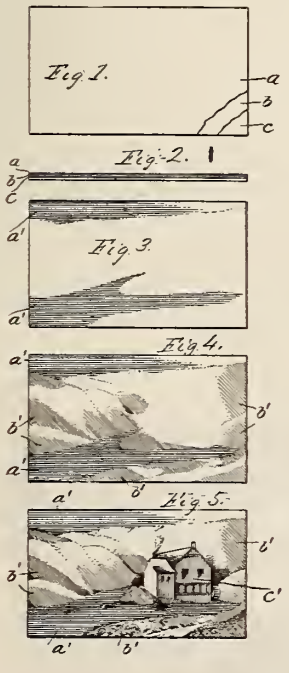
The transmutation from the negative to the positive film in the cinematographic art is, although simple, such a delicate and tedious operation, and requires such skill and care, that a plant has been established in Lyon, France, to be devoted entirely to this specialty, with a capacity of furnishing 130,000 feet of film per day. While the superiority of American films is generally admitted the process of turning out a finished product for the cinematograph is more expensive in the United States than it is in Europe so that where pictures are taken in America to be sold for European use the negatives are developed before shipment and the process of making the positives is generally completed abroad, effecting a saving of 25 per cent. in cost.

THE "Exceptions prove the Rule."

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia reversed only two decisions of Honorable Commissioner of Patents Moore out of sixteen appeals submitted to it in cases relating to Patent Office practice, emphasizing the fact that he is decidedly Moore like to be correct than otherwise. Not quite the proverbial nine times out of ten, but seven times out of eight is near enough for all mundane purposes,—a slight margin for personal equation.



It is well known that by bathing exposed films of halogen-silver in suitable solutions monochrome pictures can be directly obtained, the exposed halogen-silver oxidizing the substance in the solutions to an insoluble coloring-matter which is precipitated on the reduced silver. In the process set forth in his Letters Patent No. 1,055,155, Rudolf Fisher, of Steglitz, near Berlin, Germany, utilizes this stronger oxidization capacity of exposed halogen-silver as compared with that of unexposed for producing colored photographs. This can be done in various ways, and both additive as well as subtractive colored pictures can be produced equally well. In Figures 1 and 2 which represent an undeveloped plate and a magnified edge view thereof, a indicates a blue emulsion; b, a green; and c, a red emulsion. The blue is developed with pyrogallol; the green with thioindoxyl carboxylic acid; and the red with indoxyl carboxylic acid. Fig. 3 shows at a', the effect of exposure of the blue layer a. Fig. 4 shows at b', the effect of exposing the green layer b, by a second exposure of the plate; and Fig. 5 shows at c', how the red layer c has been developed by a third exposure; and it also shows the completed photograph. The claim is for a process of making colored photographs consisting in producing the various primary colors by color development of the exposed halogen-silver by means of such substances as are oxidized by exposed halogen-silver to colored substances soluble with difficulty, the selective color-sensitive, halogen-silver emulsions mixed with the corresponding color-formers being applied in three layers, one on another.

Values are only relative anyway. On the Isle of Guam, Philippines, ten hens' eggs is the price of admission to the motion picture show, and chicken raising has become the principal industry of the island, if simply swiping eggs and palming them off on the box office can be termed an industry, as distinguished from a fowl pursuit. Naturally indolent, the natives have been aroused to sudden Henergy by the enlightening and inspiring influence of the "movies." They no longer let George do it,—they leave it to Hennery. Here in Gotham, however, "eggs is eggs," and such costly admission would be prohibitory, albeit a few rotters might be judiciously used to add bouquet to the antique jokes and stunts perpetrated by some of the vaudevillians who queer motion picture shows.

EDISON'S TALKING PICTURES

The success of the Edison talking pictures is assured. The Kinetophone is now operating in nearly one hundred of the largest cities in the United States. Sixty installers are scattered all over the country placing machines and teaching the house operators. The press and managers' reports from all places are uniform in their enthusiastic comments. All records for attendance have been broken in every theatre where they have been shown.

While the Kinetophone has met with such remarkable success in the big vaudeville theatres where it competes with living actors, it will undoubtedly show to greater advantage in the motion picture houses. The motion picture business is right at the height of popularity now, but who can tell what may happen in the future? The wise exhibitor is the one who will welcome every advance in the art—every addition and improvement.

It is only a matter of time before the motion, colored-talking, and possibly, stereoscopic picture will be universally used. It is these improvements that will tend to keep the game alive, and in fact, to bring the business to such a position that its popularity will be for all time.

The Edison talking pictures are the first to meet universal favor. They were perfected five years ago, but by the Edison policy, were held back from the public until every conceivable test could be made and arrangement made to supply machines and subjects to the whole world simultaneously.

Constant improvement may be expected in subject and production. Practical theatrical experience was all that was needed, and every week's subjects are better than the preceding ones. In fact, greater knowledge of the requirements has been gained during the past few weeks that could have been gained in another year of experimenting in the laboratory.

As might have been expected, many other so-called talking pictures are springing up since the Kinetophone came out. They are principally synchronising devices, the inventors overlooking the fact that synchronism is only one step, and that it can be obtained only by simultaneous recording of voice and action as Edison does. When the record and negative are taken separately, only "near" synchronism is obtained and they are limited to musical numbers which have set time.

The Edison Kinetophone pictures run titles the same as pantomime pictures. They reproduce every conceivable sound, such as,—the clink of glasses, footsteps, etc., etc. The photographic figures are in proportion to the sound volume. These effects can only be obtained by simultaneous photographing and recording.

The distributors of the Kinetophone report an enormous demand for machines, and are endeavoring to so place them that competition will be eliminated—only permitting one machine in the smaller cities.

JUST GOSSIP
By The Mahoney

Mahoney Phil Robson, the Chesterfield of film representations, is much in evidence these days, in and around Exchange Alley directing attention to the prospective opening of the new Gaskill Studio, at Tappan, New York, which is to house the beautiful and accomplished Helen Gardner and her clever company of players. He is most enthusiastic over the contemplated production.

"The Wife of Cain," which he claims will surpass in the gorgeousness and splendor of its costuming and environment, the regal grandeur of "Cleopatra."

Phil's hustling qualities are of the genteel, brainy order. "Dese," "doze," "dis," and "dat," form no part of his vocabulary.

* * * *

Mahoney Arthur Johnson (the one great staple article and best seller of the Lubin fifty-nine varieties), whose strikingly magnetic personality is recognized wherever the picture play is shown, relinquished his efforts as author, director and all round good fellow, for a brief visit to our shores in search of a few hours' relaxation from his strenuous duties.

His confreres at the Screen Club learned of his coming, and laid in an extra supply of "firewater" in anticipation of the "Indian's" arrival. Arthur's extreme fondness for animals is proverbial, so an apropos story is not ill-timed.

After an elaborate feast of pure food products, both "liquid" and "solid," Arthur was seen to garner what sugar remained from the coffee service, and when later he, in company with several of his intimates, emerged from the club "Lil" Arthur became sequestered in a maze of pedestrians from the various theatres.

Rigid search finally revealed him standing at the hood of Owen Moore's car, with several lumps of sugar in the palm of his unstretched hand.

"For the love of Mike! what are you doing?" asked Bob Daily.

"Feeding the poor horse some (hic) sugar!" answered Arthur, a trifle unsteadily. "Poor old fellow, he's (hic) l-o-n-e-s-o-m-e."

* * * *

In an important feature film, released by one of the prominent patents company, The Mahoney saw what appeared to him a glaring incongruity.

A Northern spy corked his face and went among a number of Southern officers, disguised as an elderly negro field hand, on a dangerous mission, and lingered among them in close contact for quite an interval. The situation appeared strained and impossible, and an occurrence of the kind improbable. For there is something in the odor of a real colored field "gemmen" that would have been missed by the Southerner, particularly from 1861 to 1865.

* * * *

Mahoney Bob Broderick than whom a more capable and efficient exponent of screen characters does not exist, has returned from California whither he has been hibernating for several months past with the Kinemacolor faction.

Bob likes the climate of California immensely, but is not wildly enthusiastic about his experience otherwise. He is reported to have remarked—The "mileage" between New York and Los Angeles is but a trifle compared to the "miles" one has to travel after reaching the Kinemacolor studio.

Mahoney Herman Schlicker, the well-known technical expert, will doubtless take exception to being enrolled among the Mahoneys, for Herman is a North German, and therefore must needs affect that dignity for which all true residents of the Kaiser's immediate domain are famous.

Next to being a New Yorker, a Parisian, a Viennese, a St. Petersburger, a "Berliner" to a German carries with it an atmosphere of superiority equaled only by a product of our own dear "hub of the universe," Boston. The industry in this country harbors two real "Berliners": Herman Schlicker, at present with the remains of the Comet Company, and Georgie Greenbaum, of the German Vitascope, and singularly coincident they are great pals.

Both are ex-army officers, it is claimed, having served with distinction in the "Schwargen Hussaren," the Kaiser's crack regiment.

The Kaiser had both these young men under his personal guidance for long periods. It is told of one of the most important army mobilizations at Penpel felder Rof how the Emperor rode along the line with an entire brigade all attention in a vain search for his two favorite officers; finally in desperation he summoned one of his "aides," and sent him in search of the delinquents. The episode occasioned a delay in the manœuvres, but Herman and Georgie were found engrossed in a game of "pinochle" in a nearby "wirtzhaus." The aide reported to the Emperor, who turned away with a smile and remarked: "Ach was! Yungen sind Yungen!" So Georgie and Herman embarked in the Cinematography industry, and both are eminently successful.

INTERESTING ADDRESS WITH MOVING PICTURES AT MUSICIAN'S CLUB

Rather an innovation from the usual manner of entertainment took place on Sunday night, April 6th, at the Musicians' Club, 62-64 West Forty-fifth street, when Miss Emma R. Steiner tendered the entire programme much to the delight of the members of the club and their friends.

The club rooms were filled to overflowing with members and guests. The first portion of the programme consisted of an address on "Alaska and Her Wonderful Resources" in which Miss Steiner described in a vivid and entertaining manner life as it is in that far north country, and the different methods of extracting the mineral wealth from the ground. Slides and moving pictures demonstrated the putting out of a fire in Nome when the thermometer registered 40 degrees below zero, dog team races, shooting the rapids of the Yukon river, actual clean up of gold from the sluice boxes, and last but not least, the Eskimos catching the walrus in the Arctic Ocean.

Although this portion of the programme held the audience in breathless interest, the fact that Miss Steiner had herself spent ten seasons at the Alaskan mines doing the actual labor of mining, added much to the novelty of the thing. And it must be said that the latter portion of the programme was even more unique, consisting as it did of the singing of several ensemble and solo numbers from Miss Steiner's seventh and latest opera, the "Burra Pundit." The solo numbers were beautifully rendered by Mrs. May Nevin-Dillabough, Miss Beatrice Steckler, Mr. Francis W. Motley (soloist of St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York), and Mr. W. Tabor Wetmore (soloist of the St. James Cathedral, Brooklyn) and a chorus of some twenty mixed voices rendered efficient assistance in the ensemble numbers.

Several prominent citizens were present, among them being Mrs. Martensen, president of the Woman's National Theatre; Mr. F. Schaeder, editor of the Dramatic Mirror; Miss Elizabeth Loneyan, chairman of the Woman's Press Club; T. Hayes Hunter, of the Klaw and Erlanger Company; Mrs. Hughston, one of the energetic workers and organizers of the Women Suffrage party; Mrs. Rudolph J. Müller, and others representative of the higher order of humanity. All of whom having heard Miss Steiner's music for the first time were astounded and delighted.

ESSANAY

BRONCHO BILLY'S REASON (April 12).—The infinite love of a son for his mother, prompted Broncho Billy to secure money by fair means or foul, to save her home. In the first place he sold his gun for almost nothing and gambled the receipts, which he lost. That night, when all was still, Broncho Billy stole twelve horses, which he managed to get out of the pens and take to a neighboring town, where he sold them. The following morning the ranch owner, discovering his loss, notifies a score of cowpunchers. They go in pursuit. Broncho Billy escapes. The horses are taken from the buyer and returned to their owner by the sheriff. Several months later the stock buyer receives a check from Broncho Billy, stating that "this will square things."

NESTOR

HIS FRIEND JIMMIE (April 21).—Jack starts for college, off for a good time even if the higher education does not take too deep a root. Mamma hates to see her boy go, and dad tells him to bring home some nice diplomas and things, and not to be a young fool and get married.

Jack is obedient—when he wants to be. He has no intention of getting married, but Louise is so sweet, and who can blame him? Anyhow, married they are, and the deuce and all of it is that vacation time has arrived and dad's warning sticks. Jack has cold shivers down his spine, so he resolves to break the ice and writes to dad asking if he would be very much surprised if he were married. Dad promptly wires back that he would be surprised and more, and for Jack to emulate his father and get some sense and come home and not to dare to bring anything in skirts along.

Jack gives a perfect imitation of a chief mourner at a funeral, but Louise solves the problem. Jack shall not take anything in skirts back with him. A nice, natty boy's suit and a wig are purchased, and charged to dear dad, and he and mamma are asked to meet "My friend Jimmy." Pa and ma are charmed.

All goes well until Jack has to meet an appointment and daddy takes "Jimmie" out to show him a good time. "Jimmie" is a bad sport. He passes up the drinks and refuses the cigars, and when dad introduces him to two ladies of the Gaiety Chorus, "Jimmie" is about as cheerful as a chipmunk in December. What is worse, Jack turns up and yanks them both off, and he forthwith holds the sword of Damocles above dad's devoted head.

Matters get more complicated. Jack always was careless. He throws things out of a suit case and neglects to return a corset. Pa finds it and Jack has to explain that he wears it to keep from getting round shouldered. Dad says "Ugh" and tells Jack to be more like "Jimmie." He wouldn't wear such things, and "Jimmie" blushes.

Why will people have doors with glass tops to them? They are always making trouble, anyway. Ma sees a shadow on the boys' door, a person with her hair hanging down. "Simply disgraceful. Must be exposed at once," says ma, as she stalks in. Surprise all around, explanations and some tears. Ma is a good sort and she will keep the secret until she can reconcile dad.

Next morning ma has a headache, and Jimmie offers to take a cup of tea to her. Pa thinks ma likes a piece of toast, too, so he follows and is crushed to find what he has always regarded as a model of the most approved type of American matron in the arms of Jimmie and cuddling him at that. Dad strikes an appropriate attitude and says "SO!" with such emphasis that "Jimmie" jumps up so suddenly that his hair falls down and Louise stands revealed.

Jack follows and, with gentle reminders of the cafe and the Gaiety ladies, soon persuades dad to say "Bless you, my children," but he does not find it healthy to make references to black cigars or corsets.

BRED IN THE BONE (Two Reel) (April 22).—A half-breed guide, in love with the Colonel's daughter, is spurned by the beautiful girl. In a jealous passion he formulates a plan whereby the principal force is drawn from the fort to fight the Indians. He so plans that the rest of the men are drawn out on another mission, and there are but six women left in the fort. The half-breed gets the two Indian forces together. They elude the troops and attack the post.

The girls meet their onslaught with valor. They fortify every possible place, but purposely leave one vulnerable spot, which they make particularly inviting. Inside the fort, the Colonel's daughter trains a gatling gun, well hidden, upon the spot. Her ruse meets with the greatest success. The Indians attack in force and discover the supposed weakness in the palisade. With a great warwhoop the savages clamber through the opening, intent upon massacre. Then the gatling gun turns loose, and the redskins are mowed down like grass.

Hearing the firing, the troops make for the fort, and arrive in time to rout the attackers. The officer commanding the relief party is the affianced lover of the Colonel's daughter. He takes her in his arms and praises her heroism, while the troops give them three rousing cheers.

THE WAYWARD SISTER (April 27).—Jim Hollis, the son of a wealthy stock broker, goes on a visit with his chum, Henry Ward. At Henry's home he meets Nan Ward, Henry's sister. They become engaged. Nan receives a letter from her wayward twin sister Katherine. She decides not to tell him of her sister's existence. Jim is called home on business. He greets his father and shows him the picture of his fiancee. Unfortunately Jim sees Katherine in the company of several notorious people. Thinking it is Nan, he is heartbroken and stubbornly refuses to speak to her. Several months elapse in which Jim is on the downward path. Nan, in the meantime, has received a letter from her wayward sister, asking her to come and see her. She and her brother leave for the city. Jim, now in the dregs, sees Katherine in an automobile, jumps on behind and follows Katherine to her home. He comes to her, thinking it is Nan—is about to kill her when Nan and her brother come on. Jim is thunderstruck. Explanations are made and all ends happily.

POWERS

BILLY THE SUFFRAGETTE (April 25).—Billy is a bright young man—at least Ada thinks so—and she ought to know, for they have been secretly engaged for some time. Aunt Cockle does not altogether approve, for she has suffragette leanings and does not believe in all this spooning.

The Deacon calls and he and Mrs. Cockle talk about the suffragettes and Billy is sent about his business for objecting to Ada wearing a pretty sash with "Suffragette" on it.

Mrs. Cockle, noting the presence of the famous Mrs. Spankhurst in an adjoining town, writes inviting her to call and meet the suffragettes in town. She gives the letter to Ada to post. Ada meets Billy and tells him the import of the letter and bright Billy gets an idea and purloins the letter. Billy accepts the invitation in the name of Mrs. Spankhurst, and in due time Billy, dressed in the most approved suffragette style, arrives by train and is met by the Deacon, Mrs. Cockle and Ada. The cabman drops the bag which Billy hands him, and is astonished at receiving a resounding smack and a shaking. "I always treat careless men like that," is the explanation.

Arriving at the house, the Deacon steps on Billy's dress and is gently reproved with a repetition of what the cabman received. The Deacon and Mrs. Cockle are shocked and Ada has to restrain herself. Inside, things happen quickly and alarmingly. The suffragette person had a good stiff drink and smokes a cigarette and flirts with the Deacon and, finally stating she is tired, locks herself in Mrs. Cockle's room for forty winks.

Mrs. Cockle is at her wits end and begs Billy, by letter, to come and put her out. Billy, who has escaped by the window, issues terms. He will do it if Aunt Cockle agrees to his immediate marriage with Ada. Mrs. Cockle capitulates and Billy arrives and sends them all into the cellar, from which retreat they hear a tremendous clatter and noise (caused by Billy bumping the furniture around). He calls and they see that breathless hero with a black eye (soot) and with his hair on end and collar half off. He describes the terrible struggle, is congratulated, and claims and receives Ada.

CRYSTAL

A JOKE ON THE SHERIFF (April 27).—The widow, Floss, is friendly with the sheriff. Claude, a bedraggled tramp, calls at her house and asks for something to eat. She offers him some freshly baked pie if he will chop some wood. As soon as she has gone he takes the pies and runs away. The widow sees him and follows him with a shotgun. She catches him and marches him to the sheriff's office, where he is formally arrested. He is sentenced to thirty days in jail, and is the jail's only inmate. The sheriff takes pity on him after a few days, and gets friendly with him, giving him tobacco and other luxuries. He discovers that Claude can play poker and arranges a game. Claude induces the sheriff to loan him a dollar to make the game interesting. Claude wins all the money that the sheriff had. He makes the sheriff buy him a new outfit and borrows his shaving outfit. The sheriff waxes angry and throws him into his cell. However, he leaves his keys hanging conveniently in the lock. Meanwhile, the widow calls and brings the sheriff delicacies. Claude lets himself out of the cell and goes to the sheriff's office. The widow is attentive to him and the sheriff gets angry. After she leaves he orders him out of his jail. Claude goes, and passes the widow's house. She invites him in. He becomes friendly with her and proposes marriage. The sheriff decides to visit her, and starts on his way. He arrives just in time to see the minister binding the knot and leaves in chagrin.

On the same reel:

FORGETFUL FLOSSIE.—Flossie was of a forgetful turn of mind. She has two gentlemen friends, Chester and Joe. They both call on her, Joe being there first. Chester arrives and Joe determines to go. Flossie walks with him to the hallway and absent-mindedly gives him Chester's coat. She forgets all about Chester, who is sitting in the parlor, and walks out with Joe. They walk about a block and then Joe, discovering Chester's overcoat, they return. Chester, meanwhile, has been impatiently waiting Flossie's return. She enters with Joe and he gets the right overcoat. He leaves, this time alone. Chester proposes to Flossie, is accepted, and he gives her a ring. The next day she is out walking with him. Chester goes across the street to mail a letter and Joe passes in his auto. She calls him and they ride away together, forgetting completely that Chester ever existed. Joe, after taking her home, proposes to her and she accepts. He goes to put a ring on her finger when he notices the other. Chester enters at that moment and explains, to Joe's chagrin, that the forgetful girl is his promised bride. They go to the minister's and are married. She forgets who she is married to and kisses the minister, much to that reverend gentleman's consternation. However, Chester determines that he can cure her of her forgetfulness and all ends well.

A SPRIG O' SHAMROCK (April 24).—Dan and Mary have an only daughter, Norah, who is working as a stenographer for the firm of Weinersteiner & Co. She is engaged to be married to Terry O'Rourke, a motorman on the street cars, when Weinersteiner meets her and falls in love with her. He wants to see Norah home, but she declines. He follows her out and sees that she is met by Terry. The Dutchman gets angry and goes to his register to find out where Norah lives. He arrives at Norah's house whilst Dan has gone out for a growler of beer. Norah's mother thinks that something has gone wrong at the office when Weinsteiner makes himself known to her. He soon reassures her and makes himself at home. Dan returns with the beer and tries to hide the can, when he sees the fat Dutchman. His wife tells him who he is. Then the Dutchman

Thus matters stand until St. Patrick's Day. The family are all dressed up in their best when Terry comes in, and as it is St. Patrick's Day, Dan has to shake hands with him—when the mail arrives with a box of shamrock from Ireland. Dan opens the box and they are all deeply affected when they see it and each take a spray and kiss it reverently, the men each putting it in their buttonhole and the mother puts the rest on a fruit dish, which she places in the center of the table. The Dutchman enters and greets each effusively. Then he spots the shamrock, and to the horror of the others, he puts pepper and salt on it and eats it. Dan, Terry, the mother and Norah tackle him and throw him out of the window. Then Dan tells Terry that an Irishman is good enough for him, so he gives Norah to him. All dance a jig.

THE GIRL AND THE GRAFTER (April 15).—The city editor was really a human being, not one of those cold, heartless machines which some writers like to talk about. His staff was enthusiastically loyal to him and every member of it sympathized when it seemed that his star was in danger of an eclipse.

The editor had printed a story which met with the disapproval of the city's political boss, who revenged himself by giving news "beats" to the rival sheets. The managing editor realized what the trouble was and determined to sacrifice his hard-working assistant. However, he gave him one week's grace, but made it clear that if at the end of that time he was still on the outs with the boss he must seek another job. The paper had one girl reporter, and, contrary to precedent, the city editor admired her. Womanlike, she understood the situation, but knew that there would be no romance in her life, not even a proposal, if the city editor was discharged. Therefore, she hated the boss. Oh, how she hated him.

Out on an assignment one day the girl happened to pass a cheap lodging-house and was surprised when the boss came out and went down the street. She saw the tenant who had been talking with him and recognized him as one of the traction company's lobbyists. Being a bright newspaper woman, she was convinced that something was wrong, and that perhaps she might have a chance to checkmate her enemy. On the impulse of the moment she applied for accommodations and succeeded in securing the room immediately adjoining that of the lobbyist.

A day or two later the lobbyist and the boss were closing up "a business transaction" which necessitated the passing of real money. The door of the next room opened, the men were blinded by a flashlight, and the girl rushed away with a photograph which meant ruin for the grafters.

The city editor did not lose his job. Neither did he "make up with the boss," as he had been ordered to do. There was no necessity, for the boss went to the penitentiary and was unable to attend the wedding of the city editor and the girl reporter, even had he cared to do so.

RETRIBUTION (April 18).—Although the young man was a prosperous storekeeper in a little country town, he was not contented with his lot in life, for his ambition was to be rich and to have a handsome home in the city. And when an uncle died his desire was gratified, for he was left a large fortune and a city home.

The young man left the little town, but told his pretty fiancee that he would soon return to wed her and bring her to his handsome home. But when he arrived in the city and was launched in the gay social life, he soon began to feel that the little country belle would not make a fit wife for him, so he wrote to her, breaking the engagement and brutally telling her to seek "a husband in her own station in life." The girl was heartbroken for awhile, but soon a manly farmer won her heart and made her forget that she had ever cared for her unworthy suitor.

The rich man became engaged to a beautiful girl, very prominent socially, who professed to care very much for him. He made her many handsome presents and looked forward to the time when she would be his wife. But his dream was rudely dissipated when news was received that his trustee had lost his fortune in speculation, for his fiancee promptly cast him aside. None of his city friends cared for him now that he was penniless and he steadily sank in the social scale.

Several years later, a tattered, weary tramp stopped at a little farmhouse to ask for food. The farmer's wife, a pretty young woman, came to the door, and the tramp, in surprise and shame recognized the girl whom he had once spurned. She did not recognize the natty storekeeper in the dirty vagrant, but gladly gave him food. As the tramp shuffled slowly down the road he saw the young wife run joyously from the house to greet her husband. Happily they entered their home, and the tramp sadly continued his journey, realizing that if he had been loyal he would not now be a homeless wanderer.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 16 (April 14).

THE FIRE OF VENGEANCE (April 15).—The Marquise of Mendoza, a very wealthy woman and a leader of society, assembles her friends to meet a hitherto unknown artist, Lucien Henry, who has painted her portrait. The Countess of Grandchamp, who is present on this occasion, is particularly attracted to the artist, and he, too, finds her society very agreeable. The Marquise, secretly in love with the artist, plans a cruel revenge when she later learns that Henry has married the Countess. She instructs her art agent to purchase all of Lucien Henry's paintings, but to keep her name secret. When this has been accomplished, the artist is invited to view all his paintings. The Marquise informs him of her intention, and before he can prevent it she succeeds in setting fire to the little house containing the art gems, thus compelling him to witness the destruction of his life's work.

THE ITALIAN BRIDE (April 16).—A story typical of the lives of the natives of Sunny Italy. Two brothers of widely different characteristics come to America, where they continue their struggle for the same girl. One brother wins honorably and the other loses dishonorably. The Italian character is portrayed in this film with a sympathetic understanding that makes it a delight to even those who are not native of the Gem of the Mediterranean.

GLIMPSES OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL (April 17).—First the camera gives us a view of the very beautiful Potomac Falls. Then, in sequence, the Union Station, the Marine Hospital, the House of Representatives, office building, the principal streets and avenues, the War College, the White House and the Capitol itself, and other incidental views too numerous to mention, but which combine to enable spectators to know Washington as well as if they had paid the city a visit in person. The photography is up to the usual Pathe standard, which means perfection.

On the same reel:

THE SPONGE INDUSTRY IN CUBA.—An interesting study of all the phases of an unfamiliar although thriving industry.

SCHOOL OF GYMNASTICS (April 18).—The French soldiers herein show their prowess in the difficult and thrilling art of military gymnastics. They scale high walls with an ease and grace that is admirable, cross from roof to roof by means of slack ropes, and perform many other manœuvres that are remarkably interesting to behold and that will break the monotony of the usual drama and comedy offerings. It is a really good number.

On the same reel:

THE CUTTLEFISH.—Although the cuttlefish may not be very well known, it furnishes material for some very interesting study. This fish supplies the cuttlefish bone which is given to birds and on which they enjoy sharpening their bills.

THE PRIDE OF INNOCENCE (April 19).—The wealthy Miss Mills, a charity worker, finds her kindness misunderstood by her lover. Too proud to deny the accusation, that is prompted by a too great love, she refuses to prove her innocence. But things, taking their natural course, soon show the young man the error of his hasty supposition and bring him humbly to beg the girl's forgiveness, which is granted him. It is a strong story with a moral, the characters are properly portrayed and the whole photographed excellently.

MAJESTIC

PEDRO'S REVENGE (April 13).—Mr. Bernard, a fruit grower, is short of help, so two tramps are put to work with other fruit pickers. The tramps work part of the day and then start a flirtation with one of the girl fruit pickers. Pedro, the girl's lover, gets jealous and attacks the tramps. Bernard sees the fight and orders the tramps and Pedro to come to the house and he will pay them off. At his house, Bernard discovers that he has very little cash, so he writes a check and asks his daughter Dot, to drive to town and cash it. The tramps see her start with the check and plan to rob her when she returns from the bank. The tramps, while waiting her return, spend their money for drink, while Pedro hunts for work at another fruit ranch. Dot is on her way home when the tramps attack her, and are about to take the money when Pedro comes to her rescue. The tramps beat him senseless, but Dot escapes and runs to an empty barn. They pursue her. Pedro recovers and runs for help. Dot, in the barn, hears the tramps coming. She runs up the steps, opens the trap door and enters the loft. She secures a trap-door by putting a pitchfork through staples, then she sees to her horror that there is another entrance to the loft, a square hole above the manger. The tramps try to force the trap-door and find it useless, so one of them tries to enter by way of the hole above the manger. Pedro has reached the fruit ranch and tells of Dot's danger. Bernard, with a posse, starts out to the rescue. Dot finds she can't guard both entrances to the loft so she backs to a corner and holds the tramps at bay with a pitchfork. The rescue party arrives in time. Pedro is a hero and is rewarded.

I LOVE YOU (April 15).—David Wilde is saved from drowning by little Betty Grey, daughter of a Florida fisherman. She has her father bring him to their cabin, where he is cared for until fully recovered.

David and Betty become great friends. They go for long walks on the shore and often when they stop to rest, David carves the words, "I love you," in the sands.

Then the time comes when the boy feels the call of his own kind and knows he must return to the city. He bids the girl good-bye, and promises to come back—some time.

Days pass. Betty waits for a letter from David, but it never comes. She does not know he has forgotten her and is engaged to his old sweetheart until, one day, she reads that he is at a local hotel visiting his intended bride and her parents.

Heartbroken, Betty tells herself that it is not true. She rushes to the hotel and there witnesses a love scene between David and the rich girl he is to marry. She needs no further proof. With dragging feet and aching heart she starts to return to her cabin.

And in the sands she comes across the words, "I love you," carved by her lover who forgot. Falling on her knees, she flings herself across them and sobs out her grief—alone.

On the same reel:

VIEWS OF PISA.—These include views of the world-famous leaning tower, built in 1174, and shows the great tower bells, the largest of which weighs six tons; the Baptistry cathedral, built in 1063, S. Maria Della Spina and other interesting features of Italy's most interesting city.

RELIANCE

FOR LOVE OF COLUMBINE (April 12).—Back of the scenes, in a big pantomime, a boy Pierrot and a girl Columbine played at love. To the girl it was a pretty fancy, but to the boy it was his whole life. To tease him she flirts with other boys, but she cares no more for them than for him. Despite her folly he is her faithful friend, and never fails in unending kindness. Then, one day, a rich man falls in love with Columbine and she with him. With never a regret, she leaves the footlights and poor Pierrot, whose heart is broken. In a big mansion she reigns as queen. To tease her handsome husband she tries him, as she did Pierrot, by flirting with other men. How could she know that not all men were not as Pierrot? One night, after a terrible quarrel, her husband leaves her—he pays no attention to the little clinging hands or a voice trying to sob out an explanation. The big hall door closes and Columbine is all alone in the vast empty house.

And one night, while Pierrot sits in his dressing-room, a white-faced Columbine creeps back to him for comfort and sympathy. He hears her story and blames her husband. But this she will not stand. "My fault—all mine," she moans, and, although Pierrot feels she is right, his heart aches for her.

In the little boarding house she once more occupies her old room. Pierrot is with her as much as possible—his great love being the only thing that holds her to the earth. She sits all day in the big chair at the window and waits and waits, but her husband never comes. One night Pierrot brings home her little costume and spreads it out before her. For a second she smiles and then, remembering, bursts into tears.

Pierrot longs to fling himself at her feet and tell her all his love and hope. But his loyal heart would not be a traitor at a time like this. Leaving her, he evolves a plan.

Dressing in evening clothes and with high hat he finds his way to the husband's club. He enters. The man remembers him as one of the company. Pierrot draws him into conversation. He talks of Columbine. Pierrot smiles a slow, insinuating smile. "You gave her up—she came to me." He acts the knave and so fools the husband that he jumps for Pierrot's throat and will not release him until he promises to take him to Columbine.

And when her husband arrives and enters, the girl flings herself into his arms, and a reconciliation takes place. She tells how good Pierrot is and the husband suddenly understands. As he draws her into close embrace—Pierrot withdraws silently.

In his dressing-room that night he remembers, and, realizing she has gone from him forever, he breaks down—the actors dance by in gaudy array. Pierrot pulls himself together—what odds if his heart is broken? Thousands are waiting to laugh, Pierrot—and the stage awaits.

HELD FOR RANSOM (2 reels) (April 16).—Young Gordon Grant, after being swindled out of his entire fortune by Cyrus Brooks, vows to get even if it takes twenty years of his life. But his threats only amuse the wealthy financier. Gordon, ruined and bitter against all the world, goes to his home in Virginia. He removes his personal belongings to an old hut in the mountains, of which no one knows, by himself. Here he lives for weeks alone. One day he is surprised to see in an auto, Brooks and his young daughter Belle. Later, the motor is stalled and Brooks and the chauffeur go for help. Belle is startled to see a wild figure dash out of the brush and spring upon the step of the car. She screams, but Gordon overpowers her and drags her through the wilderness to his hut at the top of the highest peak. When Brooks returns he finds the girl gone. There is an all-night search, but to no avail. In his hut Gordon tells Belle that until her father repays him every cent she shall remain a prisoner. Tired out, she sobs herself to sleep and Gordon lies down across the doorstep. Next day he tacks a notice on Brooks' door, stating that he has his daughter and that search will be useless. In the hut Belle prepares Gordon's meals and really enjoys the novelty of the adventure. One night, as Belle and Gordon stand outside the hut, they see a ghostly vision silhoutted against the cliffs. Gordon remembers the tales he had heard about the haunted mountain. As they watch the vision disappears. Gordon decides that this is a warning that his course is wrong and tells her that at daylight she will be free to go. She is overjoyed and determines to effect a reconciliation between Gordon and her father. Brooks is delighted at her return and demands she tell him where Gordon is, but she refuses, telling her father he must make restitution. He refuses and she says that if he does not she will return to Gordon and stay with him until ransomed. Brooks finally agrees to her terms. That night, when Gordon returns, he finds Belle in his hut with skirts tucked up, preparing his supper. She turns to him with a smile and hands him the package of papers her father gave her for him. At first he refuses to accept them. As she draws near to him holding the papers in her hand, he catches her shoulders and draws her close, looking deeply into her eyes. As he takes her into his arms, Belle deftly places the package of papers in his pocket. Then the girl leads her wild man out of the wilderness and back to the world of men and affairs.

GREAT NORTHERN

THE TWO CONVICTS (April 19).—Beck and Lind are two young tourists who happen to be near the country place of Mr. Brenta when Black Bill and his pal escape from a prison some little distance away. As the tourists are sauntering along the road, Brenta and his daughters, Emma and Mabel, pass them in their carriage. It appeared like a double case of love at first sight. In the meantime Black Bill and his pal have changed their prison garb in the house of a friend and sally forth. They encounter the young tourists and then notify the magistrate through a note that the convicts who escaped are disguised as tourists. Beck and Lind present themselves at the Brenta home, and, on account of their gentlemanly demeanor, are permitted to be guests overnight. After the family and guests have retired Black Bill pays a midnight visit to the house and enters the room occupied by the tourists. He steals Lind's notebook and his money, when he is discovered in the act of escaping. Lind grabs him, but in a spirit of charity and forgiveness, decides not to turn him over to the police. Instead he allows him to keep the money and pocketbook, and advises him to mend his ways. On the following morning Judge Smith arrives at the Brenta home and informs the family that two convicts have been harbored overnight. There is suppressed excitement while the police are being summoned and when Beck and Lind appear, they are openly accused. Just as they are about to be arrested Black Bill enter and returns the money and pocketbook to Lind. Then all is made clear and Black Bill makes a clean breast of his escape and the deception he had practiced. Before the close of the story it is apparent that Lind and Emma love each other, and the same sentiment is manifest between Beck and Mabel.

OUT OF THE DARKNESS (March 13).—Simple, direct and gripping is this picture-play.

Two brothers love the same girl, she marries the elder, the younger takes to dissipation. Financially wrecked by gambling, he comes to his sister-in-law, and she helps him. In gratitude, he kisses her. Her husband returns in time to see this, and rushes away without waiting for an explanation.

Right here is some very wonderful scenery shown on the rocky coast of California. The husband writes on the back of an envelope addressed to himself, a message to his wife, stating that he knows her love for his brother, and that he has committed suicide. This note, together with his hat, overcoat and pocketbook, he leaves upon the rocks, where it is found by some fishermen who take it to the wife.

The shock of her husband's supposed death unseats his wife's reason. Just here is introduced some remarkable double exposure work, the demented woman seeing visions of her husband seated in his accustomed chair. As she tries to embrace him her arms pass through his phantom, she sinks back desperate.

The husband reads of his wife's sad condition and hurries home. The family physician determines to try a desperate remedy.

The husband is placed in the chair the vision has so long occupied. Once more the woman tries to embrace the vision, and finds it flesh and blood. With a joyous cry of "He lives, he lives," she sinks limp into the arms of her husband. Upon her recovery from the faint she realizes her husband is with her alive and well, and the past fades away like an idle dream.

FEATHERTOP.—A very quaint picture adapted from one of Hawthorne's most celebrated stories. Located in the ancient days when belief in witchcraft was as firmly settled in the minds of the New England people as their religion.

An old witch creates a scarecrow out of odds and ends and puts a pumpkin on it for a head. Suddenly she remembers a grudge against old Godkin, who has a pretty daughter, whom the village boys all adore. But old Godkin is ambitious for a great marriage for his pretty Polly.

The witch calls upon the devil for help. Lo! he appears, and by his aid the scarecrow becomes alive. From a chest the witch brings old clothes and puts them upon the scarecrow man. Again with the help of the devil these rags become silks and satins. A pipe is put into the creature's mouth, and the devil lights the pipe. As long as Feathertop smokes the magic pipe, so long will he have life. The old witch teaches this manikin to walk and talk. Then she sends him forth.

Into Godkin's house he is led and introduced by the old man to the lovely Polly. It is love at first sight. Poor Feathertop passes in front of the mirror, where, to his horror and that of the girl, he sees his true reflection—not the exquisite dandy, but the scarecrow clothed in rags. He rushes home to his creator and denounces her, saying: "You could give me life, but not a soul." He refuses to smoke any longer, throws aside the pipe, and we see him gradually fade into a scarecrow, which sways and topples to the floor, a heap of wood and straw.

The picture dissolves into a field at sunset, where silhouetted against the glowing sky, with outstretched arms, the once great Feathertop serves to keep the crows from the corn.

GAUMONT

LESSONS FOR THE BASHFUL (April 24). Young Marquis de Cargouet is a very apple-pious youth. He is the last of his line. He longs for the quiet cloister. He decides to renounce the pleasures of this world, enter a monastery and embrace the monastic life. His uncle writes, says that instead of embracing the monastic life, he will embrace the pretty lady selected for him.

The young Marquis arrives at his uncle's home, and is about as bashful as a garter snake. The young lady is not used to reticent gentlemen and tells his uncle that she will never marry such a stupid, that he is so thick that you cannot see through him with an X-ray.

Uncle, desperate, seeks the aid of the housekeeper, one of our best little flirts. She has made love so often that she can do it in the dark without missing a stroke. In fact, she can make love and chow-chow at the same time without changing hands. She instructs him how to flash the glad eye, how to bow until his eyebrows brush the sidewalk, how to put his arm around a lady's waist, how to bite his initials in her cheek and how to convince all round that he is a regular fellow.

He learns very well. He soon can do it with his fingers crossed. He takes up his courtship with the young lady of his uncle's choice and quickly shows her that he has forgotten more about love-making than she ever knew.

O KOMA SAN (April 27).—Oishi Danjuro, the young Price of Satsuma meets a dainty Geisha. O Koma San. He finds her charming. Both soon become enmeshed in Cupid's net. As their love-making progresses the Prince is recalled to Tokio by an order from the Emperor. O Koma San is heartbroken at the prospect of an indefinite separation. She is somewhat reconciled when the Prince swears on the fan and dagger, given him by his father, that he will return within a year.

Time passes and the Prince doesn't return. Despairing, the little Geisha goes to Tokio with the baby born of the love that had come to such an abrupt end. On the threshold of Oishi's palace she learns that the Prince has married the young Princess Fujiwara. The Geisha forces her way into the palace and faces her rival, the princess. Overcome with jealous rage, the wronged girl threatens the life of the Princess. There is a dramatic scene. Anguish and hopelessness in her heart. O Koma turns the dagger with which she had threatened the Princess upon herself. It is the poor girl's hope that she will rejoin her lover by the Banks of Sai-no-Kaware, the River of Departed Souls. The Prince comes into the room to find her lifeless body, learning too late of the tragedy he has caused.

IN PERIL OF THE PAST (Gaumont Feature Film).—John Barton, imprisoned ten years for shooting a ruffian in a street brawl, is discharged with certificates of exemplary character. His real name is Julius Reynolds. Belonging to a good family, he sought to conceal his identity.

Going to his mother's home, he learns that she is dead, and that his sister Elsie is married. Later he telephones to his sister, who doesn't know that he had been imprisoned. She tells him to come at 12 o'clock that night, as her husband will then be absent.

At the time Barton is with his sister sinister things are happening in the room of the hotel at which he is staying. A man and a woman stealing along the corridor observe that the door of room No. 13, Barton's room, is open. Both enter. The man's hands are bloodstained. He carries a short knife. He washes his hands in the wash-basin and thrusts the telltale knife under the mattress of Barton's bed.

Barton returns at 2 o'clock and is surprised to find the front door open. He discovers the night watchman lying murdered on the floor. The safe has been burst open and rifled. His first impulse is to give the alarm. He remembers that he is an ex-convict and that he cannot prove an alibi without exposing his sister to the odium he has striven to avoid. In his haste to leave the hotel he leaves his overcoat behind. His purpose is to board a vessel that will take him to a foreign country and to safety.

The police on the following day find the evidences of guilt in the room that Barton had vacated, and also his overcoat. It being cold weather, the police trace the man without an overcoat, who had boarded a train for Bordeaux. It is discovered that the suspected man is an ex-convict. The hotel association offer a large reward for information which would lead to his capture.

Police Inspector Burns, through the information of a seaman who has read the offer of reward, tracks the fugitive. By the aid of a motorboat he overtakes him as he tries to escape on a fishing boat. Barton refuses to give an explanation of what he was doing on the night of the crime.

The police are puzzled. The prisoner's fingerprints do not correspond with those found on the wash-basin in the hotel. Barton's sister reads of the case. She comes to police headquarters and explains that the imprisoned man is her brother and that he was with her at the time the crime was committed. A taxicab chauffeur tells that he drove Barton to the hotel shortly before 2 o'clock. This evidence clears Barton.

The latter decides to assist Inspector Burns. It is learned that Mr. and Mrs. Albert came to the hotel the day that Barton arrived. This couple is traced to a garage in a distant city.

The knife found in room No. 13 plays an important part in helping the sleuths get something definite on which to work. The detective's wife plays upon Mrs. Albert's jealousy by flirting with her husband. There is a dramatic exposure when the angry Mrs. Albert threatens to denounce her husband. Their conversation is overheard. An exciting automobile race then follows, which ends in a melodramatic manner, the criminal's car leaping over the edge of a high cliff, carrying him to destruction.

URBAN-ECLIPSE—G. KLEINE

THE WINNER OF THE SWEEPSTAKES (April 16).—"Pretty Dolly," the prize filly belonging to Mr. Howard Walker, is expected to win the Montgomery Stakes which are to be run in the near future. So confident is her owner that just before departing for the city on urgent business, he leaves $5,000 with Jim Barker, his secretary, to be placed at the race. However, the night before the great event, Jim learns that "Pretty Dolly" has developed a bad cough which seriously cripples her chances. Temptation appears to Jim, "If 'Pretty Dolly' can't win, why not keep the money for myself?"

The day of the race arrives, but instead of being the favorite, "Pretty Dolly" goes to the post at the odds of 6 to 1. Jim carefully considers the matter and then decides to keep the money in his pocket. "They're off!" exclaims the excited multitude, and round and round the course rush the horses with many a serious fall at the hurdles.

Against all expectations, "Pretty Dolly" comes in under the wire a winner by four lengths. The result is a terrible blow to Jim as he realizes that he has now stolen $30,000 from his employer. When Mr. Walker returns and asks for his winnings, Jim is forced to confess his crime. Roused to a terrible fury, Walker discharges him in disgrace. His reputation ruined, Jim decides to take passage for South America to try and forget his troubles in a new life.

CINES—GEORGE KLEINE

ANITA, THE ORPHAN (April 15).—Little Anita comes to live with her uncle, a well-to-do villager, who is very fond of her and treats her very kindly, much to the disgust of his son and the latter's wife, who, suspecting their father's intention of adopting her, become madly jealous.

But their unfriendly attitude does not disturb Anita, who is always cheerful, and whose presence is like a ray of sunshine in the home. Her cousins, however, cannot tolerate her, and after vainly begging their father to send Anita away, form a desperate plan to get rid of her. One day they entice the unsuspecting girl to the edge of a steep cliff, and when she is not looking, push her over, to fall, as they think, to certain death. The guilty pair then hurry away, and pretend not to have been near the place.

Anita, however, is fortunately rescued by the villagers, and the next day when she appears on the hillside, her cousins believe it is her ghost returning to avenge their crime. They fall on their knees before her in terror, but she calmly approaches and proves to their unbelieving eyes that she is still alive. After forgiving them, she brings about a reconciliation with their father.

On the same reel:

ANCIENT TOWN OF GUBBIO (Umbria, Central Italy).—Showing the most important relics of the city's former greatness, such as the Palace of the Duke of Urbino, the mediaeval cathedral built in the thirteenth century, the famous "Gubbian Tables" or Laws, engraved in bronze (300 B. C.) and the huge amphitheatre constructed by the Romans.

EDISON

THE MAN FROM THE WEST (April 16).—How a young Westerner at his father's deathbed takes an oath to avenge his father's wrongs, go back East and whip, on the stock market, Banker Gilmore, who in years past, ran to the ground the boy's father.

For years after losing all his money on the Street, Stephen Wayne saved, went West, and was successful in mines and cattle, never trusting his wealth to banks, but hiding it in the wall of the fireplace.

This story is rather different as we see the youth go back East to win, instead of going West, as is done in most stories.

The play starts with the boy's oath. His father shows him where the money is hidden. The boy goes East and is hardly settled when, while out for a stroll, he stops a runaway in which are two young ladies. His offer to drive them home is accepted. He is greatly impressed with one of the girls, who is none other than Banker Gilmore's daughter.

Work, work, work is Brandon Wayne's one motto. He must hold to his oath and turn the tables on Banker Gilmore. He opens up business on the Street. Some of his father's old-time friends help, and by degrees he begins to get the upper hand on the banker. Finally the smash comes and, true to his oath, he wins. The old banker goes down as did Stephen Wayne. Brandon's love for the girl is still alive, and when he realizes he has whipped the old man, he offers a loan with the promise that Edith will become his wife. For her father's sake she accepts him. She is very unhappy and slowly begins to hate Wayne. Her hatred becomes all the more intense when her former lover tries to win her back just as Uncle Dan from the West appears on the scene and overhears all.

Too late. Edith decides to go back to her father. She writes a note, and as she is about to leave the house she runs into Uncle Dan, who stops her and makes Stephen read the note. They both see their folly and the beginning of a new happiness starts. Uncle Dan decides it is no place for him and goes, leaving the two alone.

THE TWELFTH JUROR (April 19).—The basis of this pictureplay is founded on the facts in a famous English trial and has often been cited in the United States Courts as evidence of how it is possible for an innocent man to be condemned to death purely upon circumstantial evidence.

In presenting this subject to the motion picture world, we have produced a simple, straightforward story with that strong, vital, dramatic theme, the fate of a human life as its background.

We are first given a glimpse of the preparations being made for an old-fashioned barn dance, which is to take place that evening, and here we are shown Alice Charlton in deep interest that is destined to blossom into love for Harry Baker. Harry sees Alice alone in an orange grove, and eyes glance at eyes, telling a wonderful tale, but it is Clarence Morton's big touring car that takes Alice home. Then night comes on and all the lads and lassies go singing down the lane toward Mr. Baker's barn. Each girl carries a small package containing a necktie that matches her gingham apron. Each boy is to choose one of these packages, and the girl who wears the apron to match the tie is his partner for the evening. Clarence Morton sees an opportunity to steal Alice's little bundle and secretly marks it beforehand, so when the drawing takes place he is able to pick the tie that matches her apron, which causes her to be his partner for the entire dance. All this Harry takes good-naturedly until he is told of Clarence's trick and deception. He seeks him out in the orange grove, hot words soon follow, and blows ensue, but they are parted by the other men and the dance goes merrily on.

A cold biting frost comes up and the merry throng goes forth into the orange grove and begin to fight the cold with smudge pots.

Jeff Robey, a neighbor to Harry Baker, is out fighting the cold with smudge pots in his own orange grove. Clarence steps over onto his grounds, seeing some smudge pots lying uselessly around. Not knowing they belong to another man, he seeks to carry them back to the workers. This is discovered by Robey, and he proceeds to take them roughly away from Clarence. Hot of temper and quick of action, Clarence strikes Robey a blow in the face and Robey returns the insult and threatens him with his pruning knife if he does not keep off his land. Clarence disregards the threats and starts after him.

We are next shown Robey standing over the dead body of Clarence. The deed was an accident, but still it was a murder and Robey knew it. He sneaks away in the darkness.

Harry Baker finds the dead body and goes for help, leaving his own pruning knife beside the victim in his excitement. The stage is all set and a drama played that lays the guilt of the crime upon Harry Baker, and that night finds him lodged in the county jail, charged with murder in the first degree.

The real murderer is drawn as one of the jurors that is to try Harry Baker for his life. Robey struggles to save Harry's life in the jury room, but his nerve fails him and when the jury enters the courtroom with the sentence of "Guilty of Murder in the First Degree," it is a woman's cry, Alice's cry, that reaches the heart of the real criminal, and, breaking down, he confesses all.

AMERICAN

IN ANOTHER'S NEST (April 17).—Old Ben Radway, millionaire by right of strength, sickened of his vain wife and two selfish children. He went for a long stroll in the mountains and there met Ralph Cunningham, a hearty, clear-eyed youth, who bade him welcome. Across the range lived pretty Jessie, much beloved by Ralph, but coquettishly refusing his advances. The old man was so much affected by the heartiness, wholesomeness and clean living of the mountain folk that he wrote back home, telling his wife that he proposed to disinherit them and spend his remaining days in the mountains.

Mrs. Radway called a conference. Her son Charles and daughter Louise sulked at one end of the table while Mrs. Radway laid down the law. There was but one thing to do, she said, and that was for the two children to marry Ralph and Jessie. So they went into the mountains, induced the unsophisticated couple to accompany them home, and promptly dressed them in the latest clothes and taught them the polished manners of society. Alas! The mountains called strongly and one day Ralph, strolling through the gardens in an agonizing coat and collar, saw Charley attempt to kiss Jessie. A second later Charley lay upon his back, a butler had been bowled over and the mountain couple were on their way back to the hills. And then Jessie found her heart and courage to whisper her secret into the delighted ear of her mountain lover.

THE WAYS OF FATE (April 19).—Two men playing cards, the argument, flash of a revolver and one lay dead. The murderer fled homeward, hurried his little girl baby into a westbound train, and was heard of no more.

The years passed and boyish Jim Conway grew to manhood with the sole purpose of seeking out his father's murderer to deal justice to him. He went West and was one day lost in the mountains. He called for help and help came in the form of a sweet-faced young woman who led him to her home. He spent the flying weeks with her and the aged father, learning to love the mountain nymph for her beauty of soul and fair face. One day she asked him his reasons for being in the hill country, and he, loverlike, confided his secret. Behind the door sat the white-haired father. He rose, shook like a leaf as he invited the young man into the house. And there he confessed the deed, baring his chest for the expected blow. But none fell, for Love had sweetened the poison of his thought.

LUBIN

THE END OF THE QUEST (April 25).—Rose and Pietro live in a village in Italy. They are of poor circumstances, but their love for each other compensates them. One day the village is visited by a bright, well-dressed young Italian from New York. This newcomer, Guiseppe Rocco, sees Rose, is struck by her beauty and resolves to steal her. One day gives him the opportunity and he makes love to her, drawing glowing pictures of life in New York, and promising to marry her when he goes back. This she finally agrees to do, and one night she steals away with Guiseppe, leaving a note for Pietro telling him that she has gone and to forgive her. When Pietro returns he swears revenge. He gets his few belongings together and follows them to America. Here he begins to hunt down Rose and Guiseppe, but he discovers that New York is a much bigger place than he dreamed of, and after hunting for many years gives up the quest. He has come to like the city. He hires out to a fellow-countryman who runs a barber shop and settles down to work. Two years pass. One evening on the street, going home, he notices a woman staggering along with a baby in her arms. He goes to her assistance and is astonished to recognize Rosa, now changed by sickness and misfortune. Guiseppe had cast her off. Pietro takes her back to his lodgings and does all he can to nurse her back to health, but she dies, giving her baby girl into his charge to bring her up. More than ever does he now hunger for revenge. Four more years pass without getting any trace of the other man, and the little girl grows up and Pietro is happy and contented. He prospers in his business and now is the owner of the barber shop. One night when the little girl is about five years old, Pietro is preparing to close up his shop. A knock comes upon the door and he opens it to see a fellow-countryman. Pietro admits him and he describes how he is a rich merchant and is being hunted down because he will not pay tribute to the Black Hand Society. He is planning to run away and he wants Pietro to shave off his beard. This Pietro agrees to do, and then, looking into his face, recognizes Guiseppe. The quest is ended. He discloses himself to the man and tells him how he has waited years for this. Then, just as he is about to stab him the door opens and the little girl comes in, calling "Papa." It stops his hand and prevents the foster father taking the life of the real father. He fights the mental battle and decides to let the other go. But Guiseppe does not move. Pietro goes to him and finds the shock to his heart has been too much; he is dead. Pietro and the little girl fall upon their knees in prayer and the vision of Rosa appears to him and smiles in appreciation.

ECLAIR

THE EVIL GENIUS (Two Reel) (April 16).—Miss Helene Derys was a very beautiful and attractive young lady. Jean Norbel, a wealthy toy manufacturer, and Louis Delval, an explorer, were both paying her attention. But Helene decided that she would be happier with Jean and so wrote to Louis that she would marry the manufacturer.

In order to forget his loss Delval sailed for the colonies and was gone for several years.

One evening, while at the theatre, Norbel is surprised to find his old friend Delval in the smoking room between the acts. The explorer had returned and was apparently overjoyed to see his old rival.

Norbel took his former friend into the box, where his wife was sitting, and the party held a little reunion.

Delval followed up this opportunity by calling frequently at Norbel's home and persisted in protesting his love for his friend's wife. Finding his attentions to be objectionable, he finally gave up this plan of wrecking the lives of this happy couple and turned to other methods.

Business reverses had caused Norbel serious trouble, and his wife had volunteered to assist him in the active management of his factory.

Delval persisted in calling at their home, and confiding Norbel allowed him to escort his wife to the theatre and other public gatherings, little realizing the evil plans which his former rival had in mind. Thinking that by bringing other business ruin to the manufacturer he could win the beautiful Helene, Delval bribed the night watchman of the factory to set fire to the building. The watchman made his plans for the fire, and had everything arranged so that the blaze would break out about an hour after the employees had left, when he was horrified to learn from the foreman that, owing to a rush of orders, every one would be expected to work for a few hours later that evening. The watchman attempted to put out the blaze he had started but it had gained so much headway that he could not extinguish it, and the entire plant was soon in flames. There was a terrific struggle through the smoke and fire by hundreds of the employees who were caught in the seething furnace.

A few moments before Norbel had returned to the office to secure a locket which his little girl had left on the desk, and he was just leaving, to return to his home, when the fire broke out. Realizing the danger to the girl employees, who were on the second floor, Norbel rushed up the stairs leading several brave firemen, and the girls were carried down the stairway through a wall of flames, out through the great workroom to the safety of the street. They had hardly left the building before the stairway collapsed.

The next day Norbel was called before the mayor to receive a medal for his bravery. But Delval had only begun his plot of ruin, and an anonymous letter to the insurance company advised them that the Norbel factory had certainly been the work of an incendiary. A detective was rushed to the ruins, and here they found certain evidence of the fire's origin.

Word was telephoned to headquarters and Norbel was accused of having set fire to his own plant in order to gain the insurance money. The unfortunate manufacturer was completely overcome by this accusation, and was at a loss to know how to combat this attack. In vain he protested that he had returned to the factory to secure the locket left by his daughter, but the circumstantial evidence seemed to be strong against him.

At the trial, the watchman, who had started the blaze, testified that he had seen Mr. Norbel in the factory just before the fire broke out. The testimony of Mr. Norbel's little girl, that he had returned only for her locket, was not sufficient and it looked very much as if the manufacturer would be convicted.

Mrs. Norbel, greatly affected by the strain of the trial, was almost a nervous wreck when the jury went out to consider the case.

The watchman happened to be placed in the same room, following the taking of the testimony, and he was greatly affected by Mrs. Norbel's breakdown. Suddenly conscience stricken, he decided to confess and, hurrying to another room, he wrote out a statement asking to be allowed to give further evidence stating that Mr. Norbel was innocent.

When brought before the judge, the watchman admitted his own guilt and pointed out Delval as the man who had instructed him and paid him to commit the crime. Delval protested vigorously, but his accuser was so evidently in earnest that the explorer was also placed under arrest. When taken before the police judge and closely cross-examined, Delval finally broke down and confessed his infamy.

Norbel was freed and allowed to return to his happy fireside.

PILOT

THE PROMOTER (April 17).—Jack Rose considers himself a failure in making a lucrative livelihood by honest means. On the advice of Paul Bryce, a promoter, he becomes a schemer and successfully exploits fake mining stock and kindred schemes. As he completes the promoting of his biggest enterprise, an independent sugar refinery, he becomes acquainted with Jessie Cleveland, the daughter of his heaviest investor. Their friendship ripens into love, and, as Rose knows that the refinery stands no chance of success as a profit-maker because of the trust's stranglehold on the industry, he is in a quandary. Now, no longer a money-making failure, the promoter considers himself a failure in love. He determines to confess all to Jessie and give her up. The girl, her illusions shattered, goes away, presumably for her health, saying nothing to her father as to her interview with Rose. At a meeting of the board of directors —a strong scene—Rose is denounced by Jessie's father—who has been investigating matters privately—for inveigling him and his friends to invest in an enterprise that Rose knew to be questionable. Rose is on the point of admitting his duplicity when a wire arrives from the sugar trust, which is in need of equipment, making a splendid offer for the independent plant. (This situation is taken from life: Note the conditions of the sale of the Adolph Segal Sugar Refinery plant to the trust in Philadelphia.) Rose's status instantly changes from that of a scheming faker to that of a financial genius. The directors vote to accept the offer, apologizes to Rose and congratulates him. Jessie and Rose are reconciled and the latter, warned by his narrow escape and his moral sense awakened by love, abandons his scheming and goes into legitimate business with his fiancee's father.

BY RALPH KNASTER

In the Chat of this issue, you will learn something that you have learned a long time ago, hut the human mind is so fickle at times that one really forgets the many things taught years hack, which, if put into practice at the right time, would be of great benefit to all mankind. The moving picture industry is not all honey; it is an industry like all others, and needs cultivating just the same as a garden of pretty flowers. Even the picture operator, whose task is far from an easy one, can make everything about him most cheerful and pleasant, and make his life a happy one, as well as the industrious gardener, whose whole life is wrapped up in his heautiful garden, and his work is a joy and pleasure. The gardener takes great care that no weeds spring up that would ruin his plants and goes ahout his work willingly, finding it a pleasure, not thinking to himself, as some operators, that his work is drudgery and waiting for the minute to come when his day's work should end. The man who goes to his task willingly and looks upon his work as a pleasure is the most successful man, and he never worries or thinks his work is drudgery. Now the only way to do a thing is the right way. The same can he applied to the moving picture operator. When he starts out in his profession he must start out right. Many do start properly hut neglect to finish as they should. The operator vows to take his profession seriously and will not allow unlicensed persons in his hooth or to handle his machine; he despises the operating schools that pretend to teach operators, and in some way or other get licenses for their pupils. The operator looks upon his task as a drudge; he does not do his work with a will; everything goes wrong, and he makes himself so miserahle that he not only despises those ahout him but he actually despises himself. He finds fault with the schools for turning out operators, hut does not seem to realize that he is doing likewise, for when he does not do his work willingly, he calls on some one to turn the handle to-day and the next day he tells this "someone" what to do in case of trouhle, how to regulate his light, and many other things that is necessary to know to be ahle to operate a picture machine and takes the chances of having his license revoked. Such picture operators are the weeds in the garden of this industry. They are weeds that must he cleared out root and all, otherwise they destroy or ruin all that are good and make things miserahle for others, for the good generally suffer with and for the had.

I have met a few members of the new hranch of Local No. 35, and in spite of the differences existing hetween the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York and Local No. 35, I. A. T. S. E., the hoys of both organizations are very friendly. I am very glad to know that such mutual feeling exists and trust that it will continue. Many of the boys remark that conditions would be hetter if there would be hut one organization in this city. Surely, that is a fact, and I hope the time is near when this shall come to pass, hut it can not be done at once. There are many difficulties which must he overcome, and there is only one thing that can he done to settle all difficulties, and that is to give right where right helongs. There is a little word in the American language which seems very hard to define, and just as soon as that word can he properly lived up to, there will be peace in the rank and file of the moving picture operators in this city. The word I refer to is "Equality." That one thing alone is the only password and key toward success and harmony for the operators in New York City. Why should such conditions exist in this metropolis, and why should any one think more of themselves than of others who perform the same work and are just as good as the next? Are we not all horn of the same flesh and hone? Do we not hreathe the same air? Must we not ohey the same laws of our land? And ahove all, must we not toil for our daily wants and our daily hread? Then why should we not he equal? Surely, under prevailing conditions, there can never be any advancement for the picture operator in this vicinity. Disorganization is the cause of the workingman's ruination. Capital is away up on top of the ladder gazing down upon the unfortunate disorganized hand of the laboring class and has a grand laugh, while their less fortunate hrothers at the bottom clamor to get to the top of that ladder to share a little happiness; hut the working man will never get half way until he learns to organize properly and knows the definition of that word equality, "all for one, and one for all."

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, held their regular meeting last Monday night, April 7, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street, New York. The meeting was called to order at 12:30 A. M. by President Goldblatt. The question of sick henefit was taken up and was adopted. The benefit will he $5.00 weekly for single men and $7.00 weekly for married men, including free doctor and medicine. There were six new memhers obligated and ten applications placed hefore the body for approval. The report of the husiness agent that there were more positions than he was ahle to handle, and he was compelled to go to work on a joh and leave the office was received with applause. There was a large attendance, and to prove the success of our organization, the initiation fee will he raised to $50.00 to take effect within 60 days. The Owners' Stand-By

EVEN A GOOD OPERATOR can ruin a good film UNLESS HE is given a machine that will protect the film in its entire passage from reel to reel. NO MACHINE offers this protection to the film, so strongly, as does THE MOTIOGRAPH.

ON THE MOTIOGRAPH the film is guided over the film sprockets by A FLANGED IDLER ROLLER (Patented and Controlled by us) which touches only the outside edge of the film. AT NO TIME can the emulsion surface of the film come in contact with any metal part.

Do You Know the Motiograph? Does Your Operator Know It?

Unless you are both familiar with this machine you are not only NOT UP-TO-DATE, but, you are doing injustice to yourselves, to your patrons who are paying for good projection but also to us, the manufacturer who has spent thousands upon thousands of dollars in yearly improvements to furnish you with a "QUALITY MACHINE" where an exchange of dollars brings you an equal amount of value.

COPYRIGHT YOUR STORIES

WHEN I look back at the number of titles and the synopses of films I am struck with amazement at the enormous plagiarism going on in the ranks of the industry. Scenario writers, or editors, or both, ought to know that the law of copyright is a very stringent law, and as many manufacturers rely upon the knowledge (?) of the scenario editor, to guide them against the shoals of the copyright law, these said writers and editors should be well versed regarding the penalties for infringing copyrighted books and stories. Neither seem to care much for one or the other, so that they can produce an original (?) story and get the money for it. Who is at fault? The number of men and women placed in charge of the scenario department, whose technical education in many instances is very meagre, or the manufacturers who produce the results? Frankly, I cannot answer my own question, but it is a simple matter to overcome by making it a proviso that every scenario writer states with affidavit the exact source from whence he or she obtained the idea for their plot. If an original, well and good—if stolen, still better, because then they can be held responsible for the result, and this brings me to a point which would be exceedingly good if fully carried out, both for the protection of the authors as well as the manufacturers.

It would also prevent the pilfering of ideas, given to some scenario editors, who advertise that they will correct scenarios for $2.00 or $1.00 per script, and then calmly take the plot and write it as their own, more especially as these people are employed in the manufacturing plants. Scenario editors ought to be above suspicion and the only way to prevent any stealing of ideas is for every manufacturer to publish the name of the scenario writer, in fact it ought to be compulsory. Let me take any writer of note, of either book, magazine story, or pamphlet, or even special articles, the name of the writer is always recorded thereon. How much more so ought this to be the case in the moving picture story. Not only would it eliminate doubt in the minds of other writers, but would also be positive proof if such a scenario was stolen or not. I have on my desk a letter from a scenario writer, who stated distinctly and emphatically that in a recent prize competition he sent in a scenario, and, with a few small details altered, the prize was given to his scenario, copied by another competitor, whose position in the company enabled him to have access to all that came in. This may be purely co-incidental—it may have been a rank steal—who knows?

Almost every mail that comes in, carries a letter voicing a complaint, that such and such a scenario was sent to such and such combination of companies—rejected—and then immediately afterwards a film comes out based on the story. My advice to every scenario writer is, before sending a plot or scenario to any company (no matter which one), to copyright the story first; it would only cost a dollar, but it is a dollar's worth of security, and woe betide the film company who produces that film without giving due acknowledgment to the author with the price thereof. It protects both ways, and gives satisfaction to the writer, because the date of the copyright is impressed upon the acceptance by the Copyright Department. Then if any two, or three, writers simultaneously catch the same idea, the records of the Copyright Office will show which was copyrighted first.

A prominent writer of scenarios who advertises largely to correct scenarios and to form a school (if the letters we have received are true) has stolen many ideas from those submitted to him as well as receiving the money for criticism. This is not as it should be, and some protection ought to be given to the various writers. So to recapitulate, every scenario writer, copyright your scenario, go before a notary public, swear an affidavit that it is original, that you have not had any book, story or play to give you the idea. If you have copied from books, plays, or stories, state it in the affidavit. That will save you trouble and also the manufacturers. From now on I hope that every manufacturer will publish the name of the scenario writer on the synopsis, and on the film, and further, I hope that no other complaints will come in to this department of steals of their plots after the adoption of the above suggestions.

Alfred H. Saunders.

EXPOSITION NOTES

It surely does make one enthusiastic about the coming Exposition to talk to Frank E. Samuels, who returned from London last Monday.

Mr. Samuels, in an interview with a representative of the News, told of his recent trip to England, and of his hopes and aims for the coming American Exposition.

"They surely did treat me fine," he said, "and I enjoyed the trip immensely, but don't think for a minute I was not on the job all the time. Our English friends do not have such a long business day as we have, and it is difficult to make more than two or three appointments a day, so I spent a great deal of time writing personal letters to exhibitors.

"The International Cinematographic Exposition and Conference was held at the Olympia, March 22d to 29th, inclusive, and was a great success. Mr. Ernest Schofield, the organizer, deserves much credit, as he had a great deal of opposition from both exhibitors and manufacturers, but when they saw the Exposition was bound to be a success, most of them united in helping to make it the success it was.

"I was very much delighted upon arriving at my office to find that so many American manufacturers have realized the benefits to be derived from an Exposition, such as we will have, and that unlike our English friends they have secured preferred space early.

"I find that what with the space already contracted for in America and that to be used by foreign exhibits leaves very little space to be disposed of.

"Great crowds attended the Exposition in London, and it was said that at no show ever held there, has there been such a large attendance. Our own Exposition is bound to be even a greater success than I had imagined. We have cooperation of practically all exhibitors in this country, and as it is not being run as a money-making proposition by a promoter, the manufacturers have proven themselves to be in sympathy with our ideas of having this Exposition and Convention make moving picture history. We exhibitors recognize the rights of legislative bodies and acknowledge the good of the National Censorship Board, but at the same time a number of the recent bills in regard to motion picture industry are most unfair and at the coming convention we will endeavor to arrange for a national code to regulate motion picture theatres.

"I will be at my desk here in the German Bank Building all the time from now until the Exposition and will be glad to welcome all my friends to tell them about my trip, and to arrange for the sale of what space there is left. I am delighted with the success already achieved and feel sure this show will astonish the whole country."

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS' FLOOD BENEFIT

Saturday, April 12th, the 69th Armory on Lexington avenue, New York, saw the greatest crowd of people interested in moving pictures gathered in one building. The cause was worthy, and at a low estimate, we would consider that at least between five and six thousand were present. This should net a goodly sum for the benefit of the Exhibitors who lost their all in the recent floods around Ohio and Mississippi valleys.

There was much to be commented upon in the program, but the one great mistake was Len Spencer insisting upon the program being carried out by the various speakers billed, As soon as "Len" began to speak, echoes to the right of us, echoes to the left of us, echoes behind us, and echoes above us, made it absolutely impossible to hear a word distinctly, and the audience was convulsed with laughter at the way echo played with the word. King Baggot was the only one who grasped the situation and made himself heard in the few words he spoke. Under the circumstances the whole of the speeches were so much time wasted. It was good on the part of the actors and actresses giving their time and talent to the cause, and on another occasion, when the 69th Armory is engaged, it would be well to string some wires and a sounding board, so that the speeches may be heard more distinctly.

One or two special points of note are worthy of being recorded. "The scene taking" arranged by Pat Powers was exceedingly good. It showed the setting up of a scene, the actors and actresses assembled, the director and the camera man going through their parts, the leading man and woman acting in dumb show preparatory to taking the picture. The Spanish Dance was a well-executed little "mot," and was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience. The Thanhouser Kidlet was cute, and while children must be employed in pictures, at the same time we think that such kidlets would have been very much better in their cradles than doing the stunts this child did. The Vitagraph Girl was good, and so were the other artists who did their best under very adverse conditions.

Coming to the pictures, we saw an Ambrosio, a most excellent production.

Then one scene from "The Prisoner of Zenda" was a masterly picture, and the audience were held spell-bound by that one part of the duels and the mechanical arrangements of the drawbridge, etc. This picture has been so well reported before, that to add further words would be an attempt to paint the lily white. Another picture more than worthy of commendation was the 101 Bison's "Battle of Antietam." This picture is the most wonderful cleverly arranged picture scene we have ever witnessed. It practically took one's breath away, and held one in the throes of anticipation, as to what is coming next. Ideally staged, as far as scenery is concerned, the beautiful methods of the warfare, and the manoeuvres, combined with the smoke bomb effects, made it truly a realistic picture. We congratulate the director who staged the picture, as well as the scenario writer who arranged for such a beautiful film. We would like to see many films such as those, because they are an educational advantage where war scenes are concerned. Only one fault was observable and commented upon by many in the audience, and that was the mirror scene where the girl was looking at the progress of the battle in bed, the mirror being turned to the audience, which was not quite correct; otherwise this most excellent production is deserving of the highest praise of any critic.

A Solax production was an exceedingly choice film, as were the Pathe pictures of the flood, which certainly made a splendid program of pictures. The only cry was, there ought to have been more of them, instead of so much speaking or trying to speak under such conditions. The exhibitors of New York City and all who helped them are to be heartily congratulated upon the result.

In parenthesis, we must not forget the splendid manner in which these pictures were exhibited by the Simplex, the Powers Cameragraph, the Motiograph machines, which had a throw of 190 feet, and in some instances had to contend with the lights of the Armory. They were exceedingly well accomplished.

EDISON FILM—AN ACCIDENTAL ALIBI

I want to make special mention this week of the film to be released in the near future from the Edison Studio entitled "An Accidental Alibi." This film, by the way, originates from our good friend John Hardin, assistant manager of the Edison Studio, and is produced under the direction of Mr. Brabin. The artists taking part therein are Augustus Phillips (Joe Hardy), Bessie Learn (Jessie Barnes), Robert Brower (Farmer Barnes), and Mrs. Reid (Mrs. Barnes). The picture is unique and an advancement on the general themes filmed.

An illustration of the last scene appears in the circle on the front cover, and Miss Virginia West has written the story round the film, which will be found on another page of this issue. I want to congratulate all who took part in the production of this story, for the excellence of the work, and also for the originality in the plot, showing a moving picture camera taking the actual scenes, and a projecting machine showing the picture in the court room; the whole comprising an excellent piece of trick photography and double printing. —A. H. S.

Busy times were the three days, April 7, 8 and 9, in the work of organizing and getting matters into shape for the Exhibitors. President Neff was on the go with interviews and work every minute until he left New York, Wednesday P. M., for Philadelphia, where he was met by Mr. Geo. H. Roth, state secretary. Wednesday night Mr. Jeffries and Mr. Segall met Mr. Neff at the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel and arranged for a meeting at ten o'clock Thursday morning when Mr. Walker Stummpfig, president of the State League, was present. It was decided to hold a Pennsylvania Convention in Philadelphia on the 27th and 28th of May. Clem Kerr, of Dayton, Ohio, will go to Philadelphia to make all arrangements for the convention. Moving pictures will be taken, and one of the biggest conventions ever held in the East will be pulled off in Philadelphia on the above dates.

From Philadelphia Mr. Neff went to Wilmington, Del., and met Mr. James M. Ginns, of the Majestic Theatre. The convention in Delaware will be held on May 26th at the Du Pont Hotel. Mr. Ginns will have full charge of all convention arrangements, and will act as national vice-president from Delaware until the convention elects a permanent vice-president.

From Wilmington Mr. Neff went to Baltimore, arriving in Baltimore Thursday evening. He immediately got into communication with Mr. G. L. Wonders, of the Wilson Theatre, and J. Howard Bennett, of the New Pickwick Theatre. Mr. Bennett is the local secretary and treasurer of the local association in Baltimore. He has been appointed local vice-president of Maryland, and will serve until the state convention is held some time in May, when a permanent national vice-president will be elected. Mr. Bennett will immediately appoint a committee on arrangements for the convention, and Baltimore is going to try to eclipse the convention to be held in Philadelphia. They expect to bring every exhibitor of the state of Maryland into the organization.

From Baltimore Mr. Neff journeyed to Washington, and on arriving there, immediately called at the attorney-general's office for consultation with Mr. Darling. After his visit to the attorney-general's office, Mr. Fulton Brylawski, national vice-president of Washington, D. C., called with his automobile and took Mr. Neff to the office of the Secretary of State, Hon. William J. Bryan. After the visit to the Secretary of State, they called on the local president, and completed arrangements for the district convention which will be held in the near future in Washington, D. C.

The Milwaukee convention was a grand success. Harmony and good fellowship, big attendance, new officers and delegates elected to attend the big New York National Convention. Mr. Neff goes from Washington to Pittsburgh to address the local league on Sunday the 13th.

NIGHT LETTER—THE WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

Columbus, O., April 16, 1913.

Alfred Saunders,
Editor, Moving Picture News:

On Tuesday morning the Ohio Censor Bill was tabled indefinitely. After President Neff addressed the Judiciary Committee last (Wednesday) night, bill was immediately reported out and passed the Senate with only four dissenting votes, passing the House of Representatives unanimously. Now awaits the Governor's signature to become a law.

W. R. WILSON.

WISCONSIN STATE BRANCH, M. P. E. L., ANNUAL CONVENTION

The Wisconsin State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, held their annual convention at the Plankinton Hotel, Milwaukee, Wis., April 8th and 9th.

The Convention was called to order by President C. H. Phillips of Milwaukee, promptly at 10 a. m. Tuesday.

The out-of-town members in attendance numbered about 150 and local members about 60, making a total attendance of 210. From outside of the state were Wm. J. Sweeney, President of the Illinois League and C. M. Christenson, National Secretary, of Cleveland, O.

The following officers were elected: C. W. Phillips, president; B. K. Fisher, secretary; Thomas Saxe, treasurer; M. Rise, first vice-president; F. H. Smith, second vice-president; Joseph Rhode, third vice-president; W. H. McCenna, fourth vice-president; Henry Goldman, fifth vice-president; Frank Bruemmer, sergeant-at-arms.

Delegates elected to the National Convention in New York, July 7th, 1913: Gustav Frellson, Roy Cummings, Frank Bruemmer, Harry Burford, Harry Trinz. Alternates: H. S. Klein, M. B. Hackett, A. V. Johnson, James Cochrane, Albert Schoenleber.

Green Bay was selected for the next convention city, to be held June 26, 1914.

President C. H. Phillips in his opening address welcomed the members on behalf of the Chief Executive of the city and the citizens of Milwaukee.

President Wm. J. Sweeney of the Illinois League was the next speaker. He spoke of the wonderful good accomplishments of the league and the harmonious conditions existing in Illinois through its efforts.

C. M. Christenson, National Secretary, of Cleveland, O., was next speaker. Mr. Christenson took up the subject of organization. He had just received a telegram from President Neff saying that Delaware, Rhode Island and Maryland had just been admitted to the League, making a total of 40 states now represented in the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. He touched upon the necessities of an organization of this kind for business and mutual protection for the Motion Picture Exhibitors of the country and for the entire industry as well. He told about adverse legislation that had come up in most of the states in the Union and how well the various branches of the league had defended themselves and had won in most every case at very little cost to any individual. He pointed to what would have been the results had the Exhibitors not been organized; he said it would have been ruinous to some of the exhibitors and thousands of dollars would have been lost had it not been for the Exhibitors' League.

The reformers, known as sociologists, of the country have awakened to the fact that the Motion Picture men have a powerful organization, and that they will protect themselves against unjust laws and unfair treatment. The picture screen is their weapon when so used, and it is also the greatest educator the world has ever known. He urged every exhibitor in the state of Wisconsin to become a member of the Exhibitors' League of America by making application for membership to B. K. Fisher, Secretary, Mozart Theatre, Milwaukee.

A telegram was read from President M. A. Neff of the M. P. E. L. of A., wishing the exhibitors of Wisconsin a grand success and regretting that he was unable to be with them.

President Phillips took up the State Censor Bill, now pending in the Legislature. A telegram was sent asking Chairman Johnson, who has the bill in charge, to hold same in abeyance until the exhibitors could be heard from.

The Convention went on record favoring a State Censor

Board if certain changes were made in the proposed bill as now presented. The exhibitors want the appointive power in the hands of the Governor and they ask for two motion picture men on the board; they also want a reduction of salaries paid to the members of the board, they also want a reduction of cost on censoring old films now in stock in film exchanges.

President Phillips, who is also counselor for the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Wisconsin, will appear before the Legislature in behalf of the state exhibitors to urge the changes in the bill.

The meeting adjourned at 2 p. m. The entertainment committee had in waiting twenty automobiles and all the visitors were given a joy ride through the beautiful residence district and boulevards of the city. This trip took about two hours and only one stop was made: at Henry Harpke's Tavern, and for about a half hour the screen men ruled the tavern. There was plenty of red goods on display, and that which made Milwaukee famous. In another half hour the Plankinton Hotel was again reached and as early as 2 a. m., when the writer went to bed, the exhibitors in cluster groups were still talking features.

Wednesday, April 9th, meeting called to order by President Phillips at 10:30 a. m. By this time a good many more exhibitors had arrived from up state.

The Milwaukee local made a report that on Monday, March 31, every motion picture theatre had turned over to the Mayor the entire receipts on that night to be given to the Ohio flood sufferers, amounting to $2,100.

Mr. C. M. Christenson, on behalf of citizens of Ohio, thanked the exhibitors of Milwaukee for their kind and generous donation and said he would call the Governor of Ohio's attention to the kindness and assured the exhibitors of Milwaukee that Governor James M. Cox would appreciate the gift, also he was a staunch friend of the motion picture exhibitors the country over.

The film service of the exhibitors was discussed. Every exhibitor was satisfied with the treatment they were receiving from the General, Mutual and Universal Film Exchanges. However, they want the film exchanges to give them protection against the large opera houses and vaudeville theatres from using more reels of film than the regular picture theatres are running, and sooner or later a classification will have to be made on theatres.

At 7 p. m. the members all donned night robes and goblin caps and paraded the down town streets led by a band of twenty pieces, and in their ghostly appearance, they had the citizens all guessing which one was John Bunny, and the girls of course wanted to know which one was Francis Bushman. After the parade all were ushered to the Eagles Hall, where all kinds of gambling games were soon in full blast, "stage money." After everybody was broke the grafters and game keepers had provided a Dutch spread. Everybody was introduced to Pabst, Schlitz, Blatz and High Life, and after speeches and entertainment by Professor Martini, the great mystifier in sleight-of-hand, a roped arena was next on the programme. After three rattling good bouts were pulled off it was 1:30 a. m., and everybody scooted for taxicabs.

A BILL THAT WOULD KILL COMBINATIONS

Washington, April 11.—Anti-trust legislation is to engage the attention of the Democratic Congress early in the regular session, if not during the extra session. Several bills amending the Sherman law are in contemplation, and one, already introduced by Representative Raker, of California, has been referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The Raker bill would specifically define the law and public policy of the government with respect to combinations. It would define combinations in restraint of trade as all arrangements without exception, limitation, or qualification, between two or more persons which in any way or to any extent limit competition or the freedom to compete in trade, or which create a dangerous probability "that the totality of a national trade shall be decreased for private profit." Such combinations in which unlawful means are used to further the purpose of combination would be classed as conspiracies.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA, LOCAL No. 1

An Open Letter to Every Exhibitor

Mr. M. A. Neff,
National President of M. P. E. L. of A.,
Columbus, O.

Dear Sir and Brother: The resolutions enclosed herewith were passed by unanimous vote of Cleveland Local No. 1 at our regular meeting April 9th. The preamble and resolutions are self-explanatory. Our members have discussed this subject with each other for a long time until the matter finally crystallized into its present form. The committee chosen to devise ways and means to carry out the purport of the resolutions has only one object in view, viz.: to establish beyond all doubt and as quickly as possible our exact status in law. The question of censorship, local, state or national, is a question entirely separate and apart from the matter covered by these resolutions. Cleveland Local No. 1 insists upon finding out for themselves and some fifteen thousand national exhibitors how much longer they are to be the "goats" upon this simple question of constitutional rights, and we respectfully submit the matter to you as the official head of our organization for action.

We know that no court can or will consider a question of constitutional rights until someone's rights have been interfered with or jeopardized. We also know that as yet no so-called legalized censor board, local, state or national, has been enjoined or restrained from proceeding as they see fit in various localities, and we think that you have plenty of available information as to where these self-constituted and "privately legalized" individuals are now operating.

We think Illinois would welcome a test per the Chicago police censorship.

Michigan also, per the rights of one Baker to follow his formula in Detroit.

Ohio per Cleveland, though ours is only a temporary expediency operating with our consent and therefore not subject to the courts as yet.

This local thinks that the manufacturers should finance the proceedings, inasmuch as both the lincensed and independent manufacturers have expended thousands of dollars fighting each other, but not one cent have they spent to make a legal stand in behalf of the exhibitor who, forsooth, is compelled to take their products "unsight, unseen."

We suggest that the national officers single out a manifestly unfair decision rendered by one of the above-quoted censors, or elsewhere. It will be easy to single one out. Have the reel exhibited in defiance of the decision and make the test upon the question of his right to censor. The police power to stop crime pictures we do not question, simply the question of our rights to show pictures before censoring, just as the newspaper man publishes his paper, subject to legal restrictions afterwards.

We have every confidence in you and your fellow National Officers supported by the Hon. J. B. Foraker and the Hon. J. J. Lentz, our attorneys, and we feel that your combined wisdom will be able to evolve a plan of action and carry the same to a conclusion satisfactory to all concerned at an expense that will fall very lightly when divided pro rata among the manufacturers and importers.

In conclusion we submit that the exhibitors desire to be open and aboveboard in this matter, as we have been heretofore in our business dealings with the public and the authorities, and for that reason we are forwarding copies of the resolutions and committee's recommendations to the trade papers and the league's attorneys.

Hoping this will meet with the approval of all concerned and that success may crown your efforts, we beg to remain,

Fraternally yours,

Committee on Resolutions for Cleveland Local No. 1, M. P. E. L. of America.

RESOLUTIONS ON THE "FREEDOM OF THE SCREEN"

WHEREAS: The highest authorities, legal and editorial, have been asserting from time to time in our trade journals and public print that "The first test that is made in the courts regarding the freedom of the rights of the motion picture from legalized censorship will result in the rights of the Motion Picture Exhibitors being established," and similar emphatic statements, and

WHEREAS: The business of some fifteen thounsand Exhibitors is in a chaotic and insecure condition throughout the United States by reason of the fact that the exact status of the rights of the motion picture has not as yet been clearly defined by the courts, and

WHEREAS: The annoyance, persecution and expense to which the Motion Picture Exhibitors are being subjected in every State and City in the Union, render it imperative and absolutely necessary that this important question be settled at the earliest possible moment; therefore, be it

RESOLVED, That we demand that a test case be made by our National League officials as to the exact legal status and rights of the Exhibitors to the freedom of the Screen under the same constitutional rights which guarantee the freedom of the press. Be it further

RESOLVED, That the manufacturers be requested to finance this undertaking, inasmuch as the Exhibitor is entitled to morally clean and unobjectionable programs without any additional expense beyond the cost of regular service. Further

RESOLVED, That President M. A. Neff be and is hereby requested to act upon these resolutions at once and arrange for a friendly action in court to settle this question for all time.

(I fully endorse the above letter, and the resolutions following. I have been a consistent advocate for the rights of the Exhibitor from my first editorial, when I founded the Moving Picture World, in March, 1907, and (after presenting it to its late editor) founded the Moving Picture News in May, 1908, my editorials having worked round the central point in the above arguments.—*Ed. HORRID OPERATOR MADE FRIGHTS AND FRUMPS OF SUFFRAGISTS

The New York Tribune of April 10th says:

That "talking movie" of a suffrage meeting put on at the Colonial Theatre last Monday evening is to be taken off the boards. It is to be struck out of existence at the desire—nay, command—of the suffragists who posed for it.

Eh, what?

Yes, the suffragists say it makes them homely.

The audience that night made a few remarks to that effect when it saw the pictures. Vaudeville audiences are not bashful about expressing opinions, and it seemed to be the general opinion that those women were not good lookers enough to deserve a man's vote.

Well, any woman can imagine how the originals of the speakers in that picture, who were there, sitting up in boxes—any woman will know how they felt. Remembering the vision each saw in the mirror before she set out for the theatre, it certainly was cruel hard to see themselves so caricatured and so maligned. And, then, the reflection upon the "cause"!

The office force of the National Woman Suffrage Association, under whose auspices the "movie" was put on, and which entertained eight box parties on Monday night, had barely unlocked the door of headquarters the next morning before the telephone bell rang wildly.

"This is Mrs. Arthur F. Townsend, of the Women's Political Union. Oh, Mrs. Dennett, that frightful picture! To think that we—we—should put such an anti-suffrage propaganda on the boards! Why, it makes us perfect horrors, and my face——. Oh, well, I don't care for myself, but I resent the libel on Mrs. John Rogers, Jr., who really looked very nice when she posed in the front row for that picture. For the love of the cause, have that awful thing suppressed without delay!"

A minute after in burst Mrs. Frances Maule Bjorkman, her eyes goggling with indignation.

"Was it I—I—in that picture last night?" she demanded. "Why, it made me look fifty years old, and all askew. Telegraph to Edison and have the record or whatever it is smashed!"

Kind hands put Mrs. Bjorkman in a chair and calmed her.

"Never shall I forget my emotions," she sighed, "when that talking-moving abomination began to work. As the different women got up to speak they went up and up till they looked about twenty feet tall. My! I don't wonder the men jeered. And now they'll probably go to their graves thinking that suffragists really look like that."

Other protests came thick and fast, by telephone, letter and in person. Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw, of the Woman Suffrage party, one of the speakers in the picture, sent word to invoke the law if necessary to have that menace to the success of their cause removed at once. Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett, of the "National," who was in the picture and fared as badly as anybody, spent most of the day assuring anxious inquirers that the thing should be stopped. Two urgent telegrams were sent, one to Mr. Edison and one to the company that took the picture. Anybody who wants to see and hear a suffrage meeting will have to go to a real one now. They won't get it in a moving picture show.

THE DEAD ALIVE

(Gaumont Special—Two-reel)

The above as a production has some excellent dramatic situations which have been made the most of by the Gaumont players. The story is good, and the plot tense, the interest of the onlooker being held every moment of the time.

The theme is, however, not an entirely new one, dealing as it does with the husband criminally inclined, supposed to have met his end in the den of a gang, and his wife, thinking him dead, marrying another.

However, despite the hackneyed theme, the production has been so efficiently handled that it leaves a good taste in one's mouth.

Photographically speaking, the picture is superb—a veritable delight in this respect.

DELIGHTFUL RELEASE FROM KINEMACOLOR ENTITLED "STEAM"

Reviewed by M. I. MacDonald

When one realizes the tremendous difficulties which the genius meets in his or her contact with the jealousy, skepticism, etc., with which they are greeted in this world of cross purposes and chill conventionalism, it is hard to repress the tears of joy that flood our hearts, when upon the moving picture screen appears a release of the character of the Kinemacolor entitled "Steam," and which demonstrates to us the struggles, the joys and the sorrows of two remarkable and concentrative men, namely, James Watt, who made possible the utilization of steam as a motive power, and George Stephenson, the poor fireman, who designed the first steam locomotive.

George Stephenson and his bride, Fanny, studying the Watt Steam Engine, of which he was the fireman at wages of about five dollars a week.

In the Kinemacolor film, the childhood, love stories and accomplishments of these men are related in the most sympathetic and efficient manner. The old old story of love, "The power that makes the world go round," was apparently the motive power which forced the latent talents of Watt and

Stephenson driving "The Rocket" on the locomotive's maiden trip, or, as the inventor put it: "Wedding the engine to the rail as man and wife."

Stephenson forward into action, and it is interesting to note in the pictured story the ever present influence of the woman. James Watt, who was frequently obliged to wear the dunce cap at school, married the pretty little girl, who was the only one who did not laugh at him on these occasions. And it was the lack of money with which to wed his sweetheart that caused him to apply every effort to the perfecting of his invention, after discovering that by captivating the steam of the tea kettle as it swung above the coals of the open fireplace of his father's home, it could be made to lift the heavy lid. Then when at last his invention caught the attention of the Prince Regent, and a price was paid him for the use of his valuable discovery, he hurried to Glasgow to marry the girl whose sympathy had helped him to succeed.

George Stephenson's bride standing beside him as he studied the old Watt engine, and earning only $5 a week, was his inspiration to better things. And Robert Stephenson, the son of this happy union, was one of the world's first great bridge builders.

The romances of these two great men woven into the film story produced before the Kinemacolor camera is to the mind of the writer one of the noblest and best of film efforts.

PROGRESS OF THE 1915 PANAMA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION

While the construction of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, which will be held in San Francisco in 1915, is breaking all records in the perfection of its progress, arrangements are being made for innumerable conventions and conferences to meet at the exposition in 1915.

Every trade and profession in the world will be represented in some form in the exhibit section of the exposition, and it is the intention of the exposition authorities that similarly every trade and profession shall be represented in convocation. In the planning of the exposition such ample provision has been made for the accommodation of conferences that already hundreds of applications have been received from all parts of the world for dates to hold gatherings and festivals. The most notable of the conferences already arranged for are the International Peace Conference, Conventions of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, the Institute of International Law and the Pan-American Congress. Other conferences in the interest of commerce, public health, art and music are being arranged.

All building will be fully completed eight months before the opening of the exposition. By August, 1914, many of the exhibits will have been installed and the grounds terraced and planted with trees and flowers. Every detail of the exposition will be perfected at least two months before the opening date.

The classification of exhibits which has just been issued in complete form by Captain Asher Carter Baker and which has been pronounced by experts to be the most comprehensive of its kind ever made, consists of eleven departments divided into 136 groups, subdivided into 800 classes. I

FIRE AT UNIVERSAL'S HOLLYWOOD STUDIOS IN CALIFORNIA

Fire starting from a lighted cigarette thrown into a clump of dry underbrush, destroyed two wooden buildings which housed $16,000 worth of developed film, and did damage to scenery and equipment estimated at $5,000 at the Hollywood, California, studios of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company's West coast organization.

Five hundred actors, actresses, scene painters, cowboys, Indians and laborers formed a bucket brigade from a hydrant half a block away, and fought the flames for three hours before they had the fire under control. The entire group of studios and vaults where thousands of dollars in films is kept, were threatened when a high wind swept the sparks from the burning buildings over the thickly grouped structures. Wet blankets were spread on the roofs of practically all of the buildings in the vicinity, and despite the vigilance, several small fires broke out. They were extinguished, however, before any serious damage was done other than to the buildings originally ignited.

The work of fire fighting was directed mainly to the vicinity of the brick structure opposite the burning studios, where more than $100,000 in films is stored. The heat was so intense that it was practically impossible for the men to do any effective work with buckets and blankets.

A company of Boy Scouts, from Los Angeles, who had been working under the direction of Milton J. Fahrney, one of the directors, was the first to discover the fire. A trench was dug around the studios, but the high wind quickly swept the flames across the narrow gulf of soil.

NOW abide faith, hope and charity—but greater than these is tact.

Tact embodies all these three, and many excellent qualities besides.

Tact uses brains as well as heart; it leaps ahead; it carefully considers the appropriateness of a subject.

Tact is an instinct for harmony. The child that is born with tact is more favored of fortune than if born with the traditional golden spoon of prosperity.

Tact has the long-distance vision that always sees rocks ahead in season to steer for smoother waters. Its searchlight is love.

We saw that searchlight at its brightest in Dayton, Ohio, on March 27 and 28. We saw physicians and nurses, laboring among the flood sufferers—the dead and the dying. We saw John H. Patterson, head of the National Cash Register Company, barefooted, rowing a boat, and seeking to alleviate suffering. We saw him spending $25,000 a day for the comfort of refugees. We heard him order the National Cash Register plant, largest in the world, closed down. Not a wheel turned. The thousands of workmen were ordered to help the homeless. We rode to Dayton on a special train paid for by John H. Patterson.

Love for his fellow-man was John H. Patterson's searchlight, and thousands of others in Ohio have literally followed the Biblical quotation: "that no man can do more than this: that he lay down his life for a friend."

And when we witnessed indescribable scenes while endeavoring to get the story of the Dayton catastrophe to the outside world, we thought of those seemingly without tact. While moving picture camera men were taking their lives in their hands in Dayton to get pictures for world education, many higher in the moving picture game were pursuing tactless policies. Tactlessness does infinite harm to any business, Cinematography not excepted.

One thing is certain. The exhibitors of Ohio, after what they have seen and heard recently (they have seen lifeless bodies and heard the screams of the dying), one sure thing is, they will follow the tactful leader. They have found that tact is educated goodness; it is kind-heartedness; it is good intentions refined by high culture.

Tact is a tremendous asset. It is worth acquiring in the moving picture game, if we have it not.

As for Ohioans interested in Cinematography—why, they wish to hear of a sympathetic perception from the Wall Street of Cinematography. This means a better class of pictures and the elimination of petty bickerings.

* * * *

W. A. Brady in a recent issue of the Saturday Evening Post, says the moving picture game is taking legitimate actors and that is one reason why English actors and actresses are coming over. Brady also says that "one ordinary actor got into the moving picture game three years ago and now draws a salary of $450 weekly." Wonder who this "ordinary actor" could be?

* * * *

We shall be pleased to furnish more ideas to the manufacturers on the subject of "book plays." We have furnished quite a number of them within the past year or so, too. Look at Brady's success with "Little Women." If time had been taken by the forelock, Alcott's plays might first have been filmed. And there are hundreds of other books of appealing nature that have been overlooked by the manufacturers. A well-stocked library, we repeat, is an essential to any editorial office, and another essential is a broad literary education. This cry of "no material" is pure piffle. There are hundreds of popular and classical books and stories that have never even been considered as yet.

* * * *

There is no doubt but that in moving picture drama, as in other arts, the greater knowledge the greater enjoyment. American audiences refuse to be swept off their feet by film plays of Lincoln J. Carter, et al., and one good story from Poe, or Scott, or Dumas, is worth a dozen hack-writers' plots having to do with "the machinations of high-class criminals," to quote a house organ. The appreciation of the moving picture theatre-going public is a matter of importance. Any other kind of art can thrive better without appreciation than this art. Enjoyment of an artistic picture is not merely a passive matter but active, and taking toll of every faculty. The American people are in special need of refined recreation. We have the time and the means to visit the picture theatres, and now is the time when delight and uplift in art may be of real use and serve a high purpose. The moving picture theatre has only just begun what it can do for us as a people, but the right kind of comedy and drama and the right kind of acting are essentials. The plays should be abidingly logical, more meritorious every month, and bring added insight into character and the world in which we live.

According to cablegrams from London, England, the Civil War play has overshot its mark in the "tight little isle." We believe the Civil War drama is becoming monotonous in this country, also. A year ago, the spectacular war drama, with marching troops and the ever-present faithful negro servant, were appreciated and were a relief from the "usual thing." Now these war dramas have become "the usual thing," and the time is ripe for another shift. All such plots have been exhausted from every angle, and what is shown is but a repetition of what has gone before. Every battle and incident of the Civil War have been rehearsed from Bull Run to Sheridan's Ride. According to the London story, educational lectures are needed to explain the American Civil War drama. At a recent cinema show in Manchester there was a series of fine films illustrating the American Civil War. Beside me, says a correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, there were a couple of well dressed girls, who were obviously befogged and bewildered.

"I wonder who they are," I heard one say. "They look like English," suggested the other; "perhaps it's the Boer War." The slouched hats worn by the Confederates supported this theory. "But who are the men with postmen's caps?" queried the girl next to me. I took pity on her and explained that they were the Federal troops and that the ones with slouch hats were the Confederates.

"Thank you," she said, "but what is the war?" "The American Civil War; North vs. South." She turned to her companion and said: "It's the North Americans fighting the South Americans!" "But they're not savage," said her friend. I tried again.

"It's the North American Civil War of fifty years ago; the northern states against the southern states." Never heard of it," she said with a smile. "I'm glad they're not English, anyhow."

Lessons by moving pictures are to form one of the features of modern education which are to make school life more and more attractive and, hence, more efficient. The day seems to be at hand when a moving picture machine will be as essential a part of the apparatus of a school as pencil and writing desk.

* * * *

J. H. Berlie, a Cincinnati "photofan," makes a unique complaint to Mayor Hunt of that city. He writes: "On special days, when there is a rush, theatres will show three reels and a song in half the time, or at a speed of eight minutes per reel," he says, "and in many cases theatres cut off part of a reel.

"Last Saturday a theatre deceived the public by announcing it would show three reels, aggregating 3,000 feet of film, when as a matter of fact but 2,500 feet was shown.

"If I can have arrested and sent to prison a merchant charging me for 3,000 yards of ribbon and cheating me out of 500 yards by delivering only 2,500 yars, why should I not do the same with the moving-picture manager who takes my nickel to show 3,000 feet of film, and then cheats me out of 500 feet?"

Berlie also objects to women wearing hats "made with large brims, feathers, flowers, ribbons, etc., without speaking of the danger of hatpins," which, he says, moving-picture patrons have to look over or go around at the expense of their eyesight.

There is no demand at public libraries for "Nick Carter," "Old Sleuth," and "Deadeye Dick" stories. One reason is that no city library will carry such stories. Educational literature is in greatest demand and high class fiction next, according to library statistics. And yet, some moving picture manufacturers persist in continuing the parade of cowboys, gamblers, sheriffs, criminals, and wicked half-breeds across the screens of moving picture theatres to the disgust of the audiences. These pictures may be popular for export; but American audiences who made the moving pictures popular, are entitled to some consideration.

* * * *

Some plan should be conceived by which historical films would be purchased by the Government and filed just as libraries preserve the world's best literature. The Balkan War pictures, a copy of every film weekly, and other pictures of like nature should be purchased by the Government and kept in vaults as a part of the visualized history of the United States and the world. Think of the benefit such pictures would give to future generations from a historical and educational standpoint!

WILLIAM CLIFFORD, leading man of Director Fahrney's "101 Bison" forces, is the proud father of a handsome and healthy baby boy, who made his appearance about a month ago. The day Master Clifford was four weeks old, he received his dramatic baptism in the new Bison military feature, "The Last Roll Call." Being the son of his father, the baby acted splendidly.

It was under Mr. Fahrney's direction that William Clifford himself made his first appearance in motion pictures, when the Nestor Company was at Staten Island.

MR. GEORGE PETERS, one of the Selig Polyscope Company's star camera men, has been transferred from the Chicago studios to the producing branch at Prescott, Ariz. Peters has been the recipient of a great deal of praise recently because of his excellent work in securing the pictures of the Dayton Flood which the Selig people recently released.

MR. OSCAR EAGLE, producer-in-chief of the Selig Polyscope Company's Chicago studios, is at present under the care of a trio of doctors at West Baden Springs, where he is suffering with a severe case of nervous breakdown. For a while his condition was considered serious, but fortunately he is now rapidly recovering and it is expected that he will be at his office again at an early date.

"LES MISERABLES"

"Les Miserables," of Victor Hugo, released by the Electric Film Company, forms the longest production ever shown in this country. The two- and three-reel features are losing somewhat of their interest, because most of them are subjects that would make a fair reel, but are stretched and padded to satisfy the fad of feature films. Such is not the case with the twelve reels of the "Miserables," as the action is well sustained from the beginning of the first to the ending of the twelfth reel; there is not a dull moment. The story is admirably told and the scenes follow so naturally that there is no confusion nothing to guess at. As to acting, it is perfection in every sense. None of the exaggerated motions so common in foreign films, where the actors believe they must talk by moving the arms like the old telegraph signals. This most natural acting reminds any one of a representation at either the Comedie Francaise or the Odeon of Paris. Well, most of the actors filmed in "Les Miserables" are members of the two above-named celebrated French theatres. The lack of exaggerated motions is replaced by the most correct facial expressions, and if you don't hear the sound of the voice of Jean Valjean, you know what he says and what he thinks by following the motions of his lips, eyes, and other facial expressions. The same can be said of the other leading characters. It would be impossible to have a better illustration of the "Gamin of Paris" than the one shown in Gavroche. He is sublime when fatally wounded by bullets from the soldiers; he finds the strength to cry "Vive la liberte!" before he falls dead.

The staging is the most correct in every detail, the real atmosphere of Paris at the beginning of the nineteenth century—every costume, every bit of furniture is of the proper epoch, even to the old style of the loaf of bread and to the then small size of the French newspaper.

An excellent photography completes this masterpiece that will make a name in America, and assures the success of the Electric Films under the able management of Mr. K. W. Linn. The production is divided into four sections, each section into three reels—making the total of twelve reels.

S. S. HUTCHINSON and R. D. Armstrong, who have just arrived back in America from the Hawaiian Islands, relate an interesting experience with water buffalo In the rice fields on the Islands water buffalo are used as being the only animals that can travel through the heavy muck. R. D. Armstrong, camera operator, had his camera up and was making pictures with Mr. Hutchinson directing beside him, when the foremost buffalo charged There followed a thrilling series of dodges back and forth behind the camera, until a native rescued them Both were thoroughly exhausted from the strenuous exercise.

The above illustration is reproduced from a photograph of a "Hiawatha" lobby display. It has created considerable comment on account of its beauty and appropriateness. The covering is entirely of the rough outside bark of the birch, having been carefully peeled for the purpose by Indians and shipped to New York. Great care has been exercised in handling, so that even the moss has not been disturbed. This can be readily seen in the picture.

This is but one of the many advertising novelties which Mr. Moore is putting out with "Hiawatha."

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Selecting Names

NAMING a cast of characters for a pictureplay should require care. Endeavor to make the name fit the character; there is something subtle in such an art, and it adds atmosphere to the story. There is everything in a name. The cognomen of Jones suggests an everyday sort of fellow, while Mortimer Van Buskirk may be suggestive of some member of Gotham's aristocracy. Dickens was peculiarly apt in naming his characters, and one can meet with his names even yet in one's daily walks, even the most improbable of them. Snodgrass was once a common enough name in England, and in America bearers of it still abound. Winkle can be found in various parts of the country, and at Eastbourne, England, one can see a tombstone inscribed to the memory of Samuel Weller. Dickens drew his characters from every walk of life, and if you have the genius you can do the same.

Pure Buncombe

All this chatter about "rings," "conspiracy of publishers," the "cruel crushing of ambitions," "favoritism," etc., etc., comes from writers who have nothing of value to offer. They scream because their vanity is hurt. There never was a time when editors, be they pictureplay editors, or magazine editors, or book publishers, were so anxious for new names at the foot of good new material. The pictureplay editor is as overjoyed in discovering a good plot from the pen of a new author, as that new author is overjoyed when he receives his first check. Believe this or not—it's the truth. Write the stuff that has merit and it will be snapped up. How are you going to tell whether it is meritorious or not? Whenever I get this from a correspondent I mentally classify him as an "impossibility."

Down in your own heart you know when you have written something inspired. There isn't a literary worker in this country to-day, a beginner or otherwise, who hasn't a sneaking idea that a certain manuscript will be sold even before he places it in the mailbox. Of course, we are alluding to those workers who have talent, not some one who will never succeed no matter how long he or she tries. Louise Kennedy Mabie wrote a novel. It was her first. She sent the manuscript to Harper's. Harper's was the first on her list and the last. It was accepted so quickly that she is still gasping a little over her astonishment, and her breath was further taken away by a commission from Harper's to start on a new novel as soon as she could get a fresh supply of copy paper and oil up her typewriter. The big publishers are enthusiastic over this "first story." They had never heard of Louise Kennedy Mabie before the manuscript came to their readers. The same rule is applicable to the script writer. If you can write the stuff the editors want you will get the money and it doesn't amount to a continental whether you live in Kokomo or Chicago, or whether your name is Smith or Vanderbilt.

A Request from American

The American Film Mfg. Company requests that all scripts be sent to the Santa Barbara, California, studio for reading, rather than the Chicago offices. By doing this a delay of ten days or two weeks will often be avoided, as all manuscript reaching the Chicago headquarters must be forwarded to the Coast for perusal.

Axes to Grind

A California author in taking us severely to task in a recent letter remarks: "You seem to believe that everyone who writes you has an axe to grind. I am interested broadly in seeing better productions and courteous editorial treatment is a step in that direction. I am happily aware that conditions are improving; but when one's lawn begins to grow green and velvety, should he cease to water it? Personally I have no grievances."

Why not be frank about it? We all have our axes to grind, and the script writer sometimes demands a very keen edge. We are all interested in seeing better productions and courteous editorial treatment and, with few exceptions, such happy conditions are prevailing. We regret that this particular writer took umbrage at one of our recent paragraphs, but we endeavor to be fair and honorable and treat all alike. We will assure our friend that, although spring is touching up the lawn, we shall not cease to water it. Come again frequently, for it gives us pleasure to hear from our friends—when a self-addressed and stamped envelope is enclosed.

The Day's Work

Kipling wrote a collection of stories which were published under the title "The Day's Work." They were good stories, of course. Dear script writer, what about your day's work? Are you putting the best that is in you into your day's work? If you are making your living with your pen remember, please, that this is the hardest kind of a day's work. By the sweat of your brow shall ye eat bread is as trite in literary work as any other labor. When you close your desk on the day's work are you conscious of a day's work well done? Before you place your script into its envelope for mailing are you sure that it contains the best that is in you; that it is a work of love, of inspiration, of care and of thought? It's all in the day's work. If you have been careless, have skimped, have stolen, have not been honest with your own self, then your day's work has not ended. Today is your day and mine; the only day we have; the day in which we play our part. What our part may signify in the great whole we may not understand, but we are here to play it and now is our time. This we know: it is a part for our action, not for our whining. It is a part of love, not cynicism. It is for us to express our work in terms of human helpfulness.

The "Grafter"

The "grafter" is a thing. He has no place in the sympathies of genuinely human beings. He is a hyena with human appendages. No difference what his station in life, he should be discounted. He has no soul. We saw grafters in the course of special literary work in the flood-infested districts of Ohio. They took advantage of the ignorance and misfortune of flood-victims and compelled them to pay for being carried from their homes to safety. These men were commercializing in the weaknesses of fellow human beings. This week we received notification from the Post Office Department that a "grafter" was being investigated upon evidence sent us by our readers. He had been grafting upon the weakness of others. He held out false hopes and took money for which no equivalent value was given. He professed to teach pictureplay writing by means of correspondence.

To Publish a Book

Mr. R. D. Armstrong, connected in various capacities with the American Film Mfg. Company since its inception, is author of a book, "Making the Negative of a Photoplay." Mr. Armstrong is peculiarly eligible for the authorship of such a volume. He was script editor for a long time, and is at present in Hawaii with S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Company, operating a camera. The many writers who have submitted their work to Mr. Armstrong, and remember his kindly consideration, will look forward to the forthcoming volume with interest.

Don't Become Uneasy

E. M. Wickes, in The Magazine Maker, publishes a warning to script writers. He believes the Kinetophone will outdo the silent pictures in popularity, and the weekly incomes of the script writers will fall off in consequence. He asserts that Kinetophone plots are possible only for trained writers well grounded in the art of writing dialogue. This is probably true, but we think that plots for the silent pictures will continue in demand for years to come, and that the warning is rather early. Mr. Wickes says:

"The transition will not take place in a day, but will proceed gradually; and during this slow but constant change, the untrained writers will do well to try and master the art of writing good dialogue which will include the study of rhetoric, the short story, and the drama. Some will attack the problem with energy and determination and will eventually succeed, while others will make a few feeble attempts, then grow discouraged and quit; and the art of writing profitable pictureplays will evolve into a "survival of the fittest."

The Magazine Maker

To the scribbler who wishes to embark in the field of fiction writing we cannot do better than recommend The Magazine Maker, a monthly informative journal for literary workers. Publication offices, 32 Union Square, New York. It is the best journal of its kind published.

A Posy for Majestic

We have noticed that recent Majestic and Reliance film advertisements, in the Moving Picture News, give complete credit to the authors of plays. Maybe that is one reason why Majestic and Reliance release so many original stories. Authors should have credit on film, on posters and in advertisements.

The Happy Ending

For a year past we have taken the attitude that if the strong plot, with the unusual ending, has to be twisted and turned in order to bring about the lover's usual embrace, it were better to let the story end consistently and logically. If the plot is stronger with the unhappy ending let it end unhappily. The unusual climax is appreciated, and one or two concerns have become cognizant of this fact. It pleases us to notice that other writers on moving picture subjects are coming to our viewpoint.

Readers Appreciative

During the past ten days we have—

Put the Post-office Department on the track of a dyed-in-the-wool grafter.

Been threatened with libel suits by two "professors."

Got checks for three writers who had been "overlooked during a rush of business."

Secured the return of a half dozen scripts to writers who were unable to get their work returned from a certain company.

And every one of these writers thanked us for our efforts. It was full payment and we will endeavor to look after others' interests if they will give full facts in each and every complaint. Ofttimes it is just a misunderstanding or undue anxiety on the part of the contributor.

Pertinent Pointers

Do not write a series of happenings. Write action around a plot.

If your first stories are returned to you do not become discouraged. O. Henry wrote for years before he gained the "open market."

Be brief but do not sacrifice idea, plot or story for brevity. Idea, plot and story follow in natural sequence.

Avoid copying film stories you have seen on the screen. Some do it unconsciously.

Study the audience as well as the pictures and ascertain what appeals to them.

Visit the picture theatre, not for amusement, but as a student and critic. You will gain practical information.

Editors are constantly looking for new contributors. If you dramatize short stories, poems or novels, editors will not look for you.

Invariably bear in mind the limitations of the camera and avoid effects beyond the camera's scope.

The course of true love never did run smoothly. You should remember this fact when plotting your story.

Stories that are not plausible are rejected. Ignore the impossible situations.

Having a right start it is not always difficult to go straight ahead to the end successfully in a simple and natural manner.

Make it an invariable rule to put nothing in your story that has not a bearing on the catastrophe of the story, and omit nothing that has.

Losing the Point

Some script writers with good ideas often lose them in the story. A case in point is the comedy, "The Bachelor and the Girl," which Director Christie is producing. The script was accepted and paid for, but to bring out the full possibilities of the idea, the story had to be entirely rewritten. There is too much of this kind of work. When you conceive the original idea, take your time with it, nurse it, study it, and endeavor to develop it fully. Do not rush off with that idea and lose it in a maze of inconsequential detail. Stick to the idea and make everything else subservient to it.

The European Market

Many of the manufacturers are catering to the European market, and if you can write the plot that will interest our friends on the other side of the pond, in many instances, there is more opportunity for a quick sale. The European market is not interested in American politics, American provincial life, etc., and many editors are compelled to keep this fact in mind. Undoubtedly many good scripts are turned down for market reasons. Pity 'tis 'tis true, but there is a more artistic period on the way.

Rather Discouraging

And now, after several years endeavoring to teach the idea how to shoot, there cometh an epistle from New Jersey in which the writer asks for the name and address "of some company that makes pictures from stories you write." Ho, Hum!

Animal Stories

Selig is in need of good stories written around animals. They have about everything in their menagerie but tigers.

As to the Dinner

As to the dinner we have no late information except that it is expected to be a grand event. The place will be Cleveland, and the date will be announced as soon as we can get it. A large number are inquiring, and we ask them to be patient. Just as soon as we know, you will know. P. S.—Date is Saturday, June 28. Hurrah!

Kay-bee and Broncho

The New York Motion Picture Company, manufacturers of Kay-bee and Broncho brands, in their rejection slips are underscoring the admonition: "Do not try to limit synopsis to three hundred words." If Editor Richard V. Spencer wishes lengthier synopsis, let him have it. The demands of companies differ. Probably Mr. Spencer finds that the majority do not have the art of telling their story in three hundred words. It can be accomplished, and satisfactorily, if you just know how. Kay-bee and Broncho are in the market for Indian-military, Civil War, Puritan (Spanish with California locale). They prefer plausible, tensely dramatic, short-cast, original stories with big themes, careful characterization, and well-developed heart interest. This concern does not issue sample scenarios and urges contributors to see the productions on the screen in order to keep in close touch with the class of stories they require. The editor announces that he pays the highest prices for stories that do not require extensive revision. Address all scripts to Scenario Department, New York Motion Picture Company, 1712-1719 Allesandro Street, Edendale, Los Angeles, Cal.

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

FREDERICK BECK AT PROVIDENCE

Mr. Beck has just returned from Providence, where he has taken pictures for the Fashion Week, and has taken Dr. Friedman and his staff and also the picture of the first girl that he has cured in Providence, Miss Sophie Berger.

This is an exclusive picture for the Providence Fashion Week. As it is the only one of its kind it will be placed on the market soon.

AN ACCIDENTAL ALIBI

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Edison Release.)

SPRING was in the air. The rising sap thrilled the trees to the tips of the very smallest twigs. Everywhere the tiny shoots were coming through the ground. All the new young things were arriving, from the lambs to the tiniest downy chick.

Here and there, in a lane, at a stile, or in the awakening garden, one could be sure to find a pair of lovers.

One pair were in the still bare garden of Mr. Barnes. They looked like a pair of birds seeking a spot for a nest. As Jessie flitted from place to place examining every spot Joe came close behind her.

"Oh, look, Joe!" she cried, "look at these ferns. They are the ones we brought from Bear Hollow last year when we had the picnic." She scratched away the leaves at the base of a rose bush. "And see these sweet violets. You know my cousin sent them to me from New York. I'm so glad they are going to grow. I wonder how soon they'll bloom."

So from place to place she went, examining and exclaiming. Joe watched her and followed her about, more interested in the human flower than any other.

"I'm afraid it's too cool out here for you," he said finally. "Remember spring is only just beginning. It is damp here. We had better go in."

"Oh, I'll read you my poem. I wrote it today, after I'd been helping the chickens hatch," cried Jessie.

"I'd like to hear it, all right," Joe answered. "I didn't know chickens had any poetry."

In the sitting room by the light of the lamp Jessie produced her poem.

"Shall I read it to you, or do you want to read it yourself?" she asked.

"Oh, you read it."

"Maybe you'll think it's silly."

"No, I won't. What's the name of it?"

"Why, it hasn't any," exclaimed Jessie in surprise. "I forgot it had to have a name. It's very short. Do little ones have to have names too?"

"I guess so. But I guess you can find one," answered Joe reassuringly.

"Well," began Jessie, "I'll read it to you. Now, don't laugh."

"All right."

"It's only four lines:

"Like a hatching, downy chick,
Love, in its troubled course,
One may help a very little,
But must never use much force."

Jessie laughed shyly and hid her face for a moment. "Do you think it's silly?" she asked.

"I think it's grand," Joe answered, with eyes wide with astonishment. "You're awful smart, Jessie."

Silence fell between them for a time. Then Joe leaned toward the girl and gently took her hand. "I'll tell you without any help that I love you. I guess you know it already. Do you love me too?"

"Yes, I've only been waiting for you to tell me. Why didn't you before?"

Joe laughed foolishly. "I suppose I'm like the chicken."

He drew her to him, and as their lips met, the song of spring sang in their hearts.

A door closed and they both turned. Jessie's father stood frowning at them.

What does this mean?" he demanded.

Jessie tried to put her arms around his neck, but he repulsed her.

"Father," she pleaded, "I love Joe and he loves me. Don't look like that. We want your blessing."

"Well, you won't get it," answered Mr. Barnes sternly. "Jessie, go to your room. I wish to speak to this man."

Jessie obeyed reluctantly, pressing Joe's hand as she passed him.

"Now, sir," began Mr. Barnes, "I shall speak plainly to you. I don't want you here and I don't want you to have anything to do with Jessie."

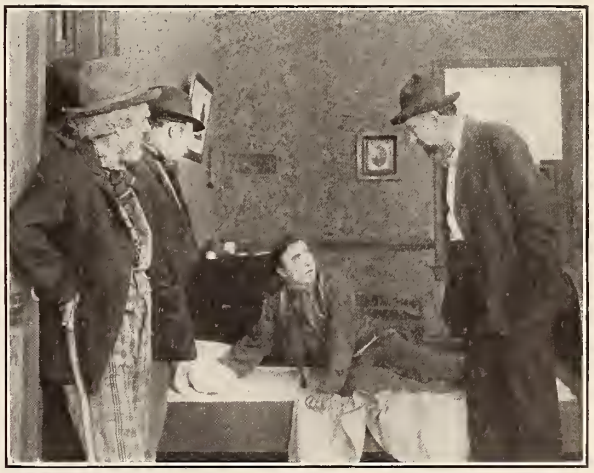
"I have a right to know why," demanded Joe.

"Very well, I'll tell you why. You're not good enough for my girl. That's why."

"Why not?"

"Because you drink and gamble. Your reputation's bad. I don't want you to see Jessie again."

"Yes, I have taken a drink and I have gambled, but I don't do it all the time, as you seem to think. And if I had Jessie I wouldn't do it at all."



JOE ARRESTED BY THE SHERIFF

"Well, you can't have her," thundered Mr. Barnes. "Now, get out. There's the door!"

He stood aside and pointed to the door. Joe walked to it. Then he cried with passion, "You needn't think you can stand between us this way."

"Go!"

The door closed behind him.

Like many another foolish young man under like circumstances Joe Hardy went to the village saloon and began talking of his grievance to the neighbors gathered there. "I'll fix him," he threatened, "I'll get even with him for turning me out of his house. He'll see!"

Joe stalked out of the saloon with his fists clenched. He wandered round the village streets, too angry to go home and not knowing what to do.

As dawn was breaking he started home. He would get some sleep and then he would know better how to go about seeing Jessie.

Just as he was turning from the main village street into the road leading to his farm he stopped. There before him was a notice, "Men wanted for the army." He started on, stopped and looked back at the notice, and then he walked up to it again. This time he read it through. "I'll go," he exclaimed, "I'll go to New York and enlist and forget old man Barnes." Then he thought of Jessie. What would she think? Well, he could write her and tell her he thought it was best. He wasn't going to stay around there to be insulted by old Barnes, and he didn't want to do anything to make trouble for the girl. Yes, he would go!

Joe heard the early train whistle. He quickly made his way to the station. The platform was deserted when he stepped aboard the train and it started on its way to New York without any one of the villagers knowing of Joe's departure.

The young farmer had never been to the city, and there were many things he had not seen, so there was much to attract his attention.

When he left the train the first thing he saw was a sign on the platform like the one which had brought him there. A recruiting sergeant moved back and forth near-by. Joe stopped a moment, undecided. Somehow, as he was coming farther and farther away from Jessie his mind began to waver on the subject.

"Well, I'll have a look around first, before I decide," he thought, and turned away from the sign.

It was about nine o'clock, and from then until late in the afternoon Joe explored New York. The high buildings, the subway, the elevated and all the marvelous things he saw on the streets held him spellbound, but one thing interested him more than all the others. He had wandered into a residential street when he saw a number of people acting in a very peculiar way. Some were running in and out of a house and some were watching them. Yet they didn't seem to have any special interest in the house. One man stood at a distance from the others and said things that sounded very foolish to Joe. Two men stood behind a box on three legs and one of them turned a handle attached to the side of the box. A short distance away another man was turning the handle on a similar box.

Joe watched and wondered for a long time, then he decided to ask questions. Going up to the first man who was turning the handle he said:

"What's that?"

"I'm not really takin' this one. The fellow with the other camera is takin' the picture and I'm just pretending."

"What's that for?" asked Joe, puzzled.

"Why, this picture is called 'How Moving Pictures Are Made.' It shows the whole process."

"Gee, I'd like to see it."

"Where do you live?" asked the man.

"Upton."

"Do they have pictures there?"

"No, there are only a couple of hundred people there," explained Joe, "but over at the next town they have over a thousand and they have movin' pictures at the town hall on Saturday nights. I go over often."

"Well, I hope you can see this sometime. We're through here now. Good-by."

"Good-by. I'm much obliged," Joe called after the man.

When he was alone he stood still. What should he do now? He had almost forgotten why he had come to the city. It seemed a long time since he left home. An overwhelming desire to see Jessie came over him. "I'm goin' back!" he exclaimed under his breath, and started for the train to take him home.

At the little Upton station, in the fading light, Joe saw several of his companions of the night before. He did not feel like meeting them, so he slipped from the rear platform of the train and took a path through the woods leading to his home.

He was glad to be back. All his thoughts were with Jessie, and his love for her was fast overcoming his anger toward her father.

Now and then he stopped to listen to the sleepy twittering of some bird, or to breathe the fresh earth smell around him. Suddenly he stumbled and almost fell. He looked to see what he had tripped upon. There at his feet lay a man. He stooped and turned him over.

"Oh," he cried in a whisper, "it's old man Barnes and he's dead!"

In a flash the realization of the position he was in came to Joe. "Oh, God," he moaned, "why was I such a fool as to make threats?"

He must not be seen near the body, that was certain. He sprang to his feet and ran rapidly through the woods to his home.

Until he was in bed Joe did not know how tired he was. He only then remembered that he had not had any sleep the night before. In spite of his anxiety of mind he was soon asleep without even removing his clothing.

It seemed to the young farmer that he had not been in bed an hour when there came a loud knock at his door. He sat up in bed to find the sheriff with a hand on his shoulder and several of his companions of the night before standing at the door.

"What does this mean?" he asked, half asleep.

"I guess you know, all right. Come along with me."

Joe continued to stare.

"Did you ever see this?" demanded the sheriff, drawing something from his pocket.

Joe looked to see his own handkerchief. He started. Of course it had dropped from his pocket as he stooped over the dead man. Something must be done quickly.

"You're on the wrong track, Sheriff," he cried. "I have been in New York all day."

The men laughed. "Very likely," said one. "You don't remember saying you would fix Barnes."

Joe had nothing to say. In less than a half hour he found himself in the little building that served as a jail.

All the village and country-side believed him guilty—excepting Jessie. She said from the very first that she knew he was innocent. She told Joe so and his heart was greatly comforted in spite of his terrible trouble.

The trial came quickly and was quickly over. Joe's lawyer could say little but that his client had been in New York the day Mr. Barnes was killed—and this he could not prove.

"You say you were in New York on the day Mr. Barnes was killed?" asked the attorney for the state.

"Yes."

"What time did you go?"

"On the early morning train—five-twenty-five."

"Why did you go?"

"I intended to enlist in the army."

"Oh, you did? Well, why didn't you do it?"

"I changed my mind."

"And came home again?"

"Yes."

"What time did you come home?"

"On the seven-ten P. M."

"Was there anybody at the station you knew?"

"Yes, several persons."

"Did they see you?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because I left the train at the back and took a short cut through the woods."

"Why didn't you stop to speak to these people?"

"I didn't feel in the humor."

The lawyer hesitated a moment and Joe drew himself together for what he knew was coming.

"Did you ever see this?" he cried dramatically, producing the handkerchief the sheriff had shown Joe the night he arrested him.

"Yes," answered the farmer in a low tone.

"Does it belong to you?"

"Yes."

"Do you know how this handkerchief could have gotten beside the body of Mr. Barnes?" thundered the lawyer.

"Yes," cried Joe, springing to his feet. "I stumbled over his body as I went through the woods and I suppose I dropped it."

A laugh ran around the court room for a moment. And the cross examination went on.

Joe was in despair. It was no use, he thought, they were determined not to believe him.

The jury stayed out but a short while and returned the verdict of "Guilty of murder in the first degree."

When Jessie heard the result of the trial she was prostrated with grief. As the days dragged by she became more and more nervous. At last, after much pleading, her mother persuaded her to go to New York for a visit to her cousin...

When Jessie had been gone a week Joe's lawyer received a telegram which read:

"Upton, New York.

"Have absolute proof of Joe's innocence. Am returning at once. Jessie Barnes."

Joe was given an immediate new trial. The eyes of those present to hear the reported sensational evidence were fixed on a mysterious machine at one side of the court room.

The jury was assembled and at a sign from the judge the curtains were drawn and a moving picture was thrown on the wall before the astonished eyes of the crowd.

In a moment the very prisoner before them walked into the scene and stood conversing with a man who turned the crank of a moving picture camera.

A great shout was given. The jury arose as one man and as one man cried "Not guilty!"

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Eclair (Paris)

"The Evil Genius" is a tremendously strong drama—a most convincing production.

Crystal

"Two Lunatics" and "His Romantic Wife" on the same reel are very fair offerings. The former has some excellent comedy situations which have been made the best of.

Nestor

"For Her Sake" is somewhat out of the ordinary in that it reminds us of the Jewish law that no Jew shall marry a Gentile. This is a very good picture, although the writer does not favor subjects touching on any religious law.

"His Friend Jimmy" is a sample of excellent comedy. The ruse of the young couple to visit "Ma" and "Pa," who, especially the latter, are bitterly opposed to the son of the house marrying so soon. In answer to dad's invitation to "come home at once and bring nothing in skirts with you," the young bride breaks in on the family in male attire.

Kinemacolor

"Nathan Hale" in three reels is not only interesting as an historical production, but gives ample scope to the Kinemacolor process for the getting of effective work.

"Water Babies," a zoological study of seal, otter and bear and other animals is most instructive and delightful.

Pathe

"The Snapshot," released April 8th, is an excellent sample of comedy. The story is well developed, and the action and business good.

"The River Clyde at Lanark" (Scotland), on the same reel, is a beautiful scenic in colors—perfectly exquisite.

"The Analysis of Motion," released April 11th, gives one of the strongest proofs of the advantages of Cinematography. This is a film in which the pictures have been taken at the rate of twelve hundred per second, thus enabling the naked eye to follow the actual course of the bullet through the air. Another illustration is the elevation of a rubber ball by a jet of water. The demonstration is an intensely interesting one.

"The Locust," following the above, is most instructive, explaining and illustrating nature's method of bringing the locust into the world.

Keystone

"That Ragtime Band," an eccentric farce comedy, ranges fair.

"Algie on the Force" has a situation that cannot help but bring a laugh. Algie mistaking the new mayor for a criminal and tying him to the telegraph post is really funny.

Reliance

"The She-Wolf," a trapper story. The film is well produced, and smooth in its development, but this particular theme has been duplicated too often.

Kay-Bee

"The Redemption," in two reels, appealed to the writer as being rampant with human interest. The story is consistent, a reason being imminent for each new development of the story, and it is generally speaking a good offering.

Thanhouser

"The Children's Conspiracy" is a most interesting bit of child acting, showing in comedy-drama how two children outwitted the head of the school board, and caused to be reinstalled in her place the teacher of their choice.

"Retribution" is also very excellent. The theme of this story has, it is true, been done over in many different guises, but it must also be admitted that the Thanhouser director has succeeded in making this particular production intensely interesting.

"The Girl and the Grafter" is a cracker-jack for thrills. Where the girl reporter gets the better of a tense situation by taking a flashlight on the Q. T. of the "lobbyist" and the "boss" closing a business transaction, thereby getting a scoop for the paper, is a great stunt.

American

"When Jim Returned" is a peculiar production, which leaves one with a half frown, and a bewildering sense of not having quite grasped the "reason." It is nevertheless not uninteresting.

Bison 101

"The Fighting Parson" hits one hard. It is, in its two reels of film, a most interesting production. Of its kind it stands well.

Eclair

"Their Only Child" and "Fire," on the same reel, are good offerings. The former is one of the funniest of McManus's offerings.

Great Northern (Feature)

"The Black Chancellor," in three reels, is without a doubt one of the best film stories that has appeared. As a production it stands A1. There is not a single link missing to mar the continuity of development, and the action of the piece is little short of perfect.

"Told in Confidence," as its name implies, treats of gossip. The production has a touch of originality and the comedy of the situation is good.

Gaumont (Hand-Colored)

"The Eyes That Could Not Close," so far as beauty of coloring is concerned, is without flaw, but the story is not in construction or excellence of theme up to the usual Gaumont standard.

"The Rays of Death" has a theme which might have been made much of. From a photographic standpoint the picture is almost perfect.

Imp

"The Regeneration of John Storm" is a masterpiece in production. The story is good, and the production is a delightful bit of dramatic action.

Gem

"Burglarizing Billy" will fit almost any audience. It is a pleasing bit of comedy.

Powers

"When Dolly Dies" and "Farot's Island" (off the coast of Norway), on the same reel, are two delightful bits. The former features Early and Mattie, the popular Powers child actors.

Kalem

"The Indestructible Mr. Jenks" is very funny, although the touch of mourning at the finale is not only a surprise, but a "jar."

"The Scimitar and the Prophet" is a good bit of drama with Egyptian setting. It is well produced and quite thrilling enough for general purposes.

Vitagraph

"The Web," in two reels, is another remarkable sample of photodrama. This production has had the advantage of having a well-constructed story as a basis. There is no fault to be found with it, so far as the writer's knowledge goes.

Essanay

"The Little Mother" will no doubt find a response in many feminine hearts. As a production it is very fair.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

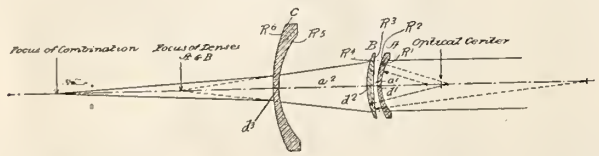
Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

The report of the Committee on Patent Law and Administration appointed by the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce is of importance because it reflects the consensus of opinion in one of the richest manufacturing districts in the country. This committee was instituted largely to determine the possible effect of the obnoxious "Oldfield Bill" if enacted into law, although the field of investigation was not limited thereto, nor is the report, which however is concise and definite enough as to the "Oldfield" and other ill-advised and ignorant attempts to tamper with laws which have made the country pre-eminently supreme in the arts and sciences. We beg to submit what may be designated as the preamble to this interesting and valuable report. "Your committee definitely recommends that the influence and power of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce be exercised: (1) to secure the defeat of H. R. 23,417—the Oldfield Bill; and (2) to bring about congressional or executive action to secure immediate, competent and concentrated inquiry under national auspices, designed to lead to a recommendation and ultimate action by the proper authority upon the changes, if any, in patent or other law, Patent Office procedure and court procedure necessary to restore to an American patent under our existing complex industrial conditions and the relatively great dissemination of technical knowledge, the commercial status it enjoyed under the simpler and scientifically and technically more ignorant period immediately succeeding the passage of the law of 1836; and (3) to enlist the assistance of other chambers of commerce and other interested bodies to the above ends."

There were introduced during the last Congress seventy-five bills relating to this subject, but not one treats it comprehensively and very few attempt to correct the abuses or increase the effectiveness of the patent system. In fact many of the bills seem to have been designed, in effect, to destroy the patent system altogether.

The Societe "Savoia Film," of Turin, Italy, has applied for registration of the annexed trade-mark for moving picture films, and machines for taking, projecting, printing and perforating moving picture films, claiming use since April 6, 1911.

An improved lens system adapted more especially for use in objectives of telephotographic cameras, is illustrated in the accompanying diagram, being the invention of Robert D. Gray, of Ridgewood, N. J. (Letters Patent No. 1,053,128) designed to overcome astigmatism, curved field, spherical and chromatic aberration and other defects. The three lenses A, B and C form the objectives. A is a dispersing flint glass lens, B is a collecting crown glass lens, and C is a dispersing lens, movable toward and from the lenses B and A to vary the focus. The lenses A and C are jointly of sufficient dispersive power to achromatize the collecting lens B, and in order to produce the desired rectilinearity, the lenses A and



B together have a focal length approximately half of the complete objective. The lenses A and B together produce the well-known barrel distortion, which is corrected by the lens C acting in a contrary direction, the lens C at the same time lengthening the focus of the oblique rays relatively more than those along the optical axis, which produces a flat field and places the optical center forward of the first lens A. The concave surface of the lens A is of shorter radius than the convex surface of the collecting lens B. Reference letters d1, d2 and d3 signify the thickness of lenses A, B and C, at the axis; letters R*1*, R*2*, R*3*, R*4*, R*5* and R*6* indicate the radii of lens surfaces; and letters a1 and a2, indicate axial distances between the facing surfaces of lenses A, B and C, respectively. The inventor claims a lens system for photographic objectives, comprising a positive collecting meniscus lens and two minus meniscus lenses, one front and one in the rear of the said positive collecting lens, the lenses having air spaces between them, the concave surface of the said front minus meniscus lens having a shorter radius than the radius of the convex surface of the said positive collecting lens, the equivalent focal length of the system being positive, the said front meniscus lens and the said positive collecting meniscus lens having jointly a positive focal length approximately one-half of the system, the curvatures of all the lenses being in the same direction.

The Iowa Supreme Court in State ex rel. Kirby v. Henderson holds that an official cannot be "privately intoxicated and officially sober" at one and the same time—one of the disadvantages of public office holding. Would this ruling apply to the film censors that it is proposed to appoint through political influence in Greater New York?

"Why not have a public censorship of laws? We have one of moving pictures, and all morals or laws are very much more important because they can cause so much more trouble." —Life.

A new process for producing three-color screens has been invented by Robert Krayn, of Berlin, Germany, who assigns the Patent No. 1,055,189 to "The Firm of Deutsche-Raster-Gesellschaft mit Breschrankter Haftung, of Berlin-Steglitz," Germany. The specification is relatively as long and intricate as the name of the assignee. The invention is based upon the discovery, in the chemistry of colloids, that colored gelatin may be immunized against a great number of solutions of coloring matters by treating the colored gelatin with a tanning agent that is also a mordant for the coloring matter. The process consists in coating with a fatty substance, which can be washed off, those parts of a gelatined surface which are to remain untouched by the first ground color used, said fatty substance being impervious to color and mordant; then coloring the open interspaces of the coated gelatin surface in the first ground color, and treating the colored spots with an agent which acts as a mordant and also as a tanning material for gelatin; then drying the screens and washing the fatty substance off; then applying a second coat of fatty substance to the uncolored parts of the gelatin surface which are to remain untouched by the second ground color, then coloring the open interspaces of the gelatin surface with the second ground color, then treating the same with such a tanning and mordanting agent; then removing the fatty substance; and finally applying a third ground color. The accompanying view is a diagrammatic representation of a completed screen plate, a, indicating the parts of the gelatin surface of the plate which have been treated with fatty ink; b, the parts which have been colored by dipping printed plate in the first (for instance red) solution; c, the second or blue colored portion, and d, the third or green portion.

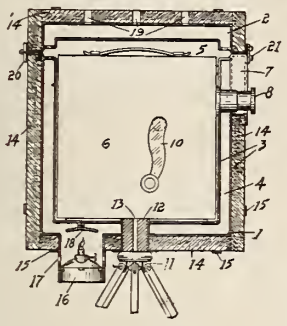
On appeal a decree of divorce being affirmed in Apple vs. Apple (152 Southern Reporter 296) would indicate incompatible tartness on one side at least. Certainly defendant did not 'peal well.

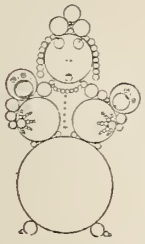
In taking motion pictures in a cold, dry climate, much difficulty has heretofore been experienced in obtaining clear negatives because of the production of "static flashes" on the film due to the action, on the sensitized surface of the film, of the static electricity generated by the rapid movement of the film in the operation of the camera. Low temperatures also render the film brittle and consequently it frequently breaks during operation of the camera.



Henry Cronjager, of New York City, overcomes these difficulties by means set forth in his Letters Patent 1,056,507, the accompanying view representing a sectional elevation illustrating the essential feature of the invention, which consists in encasing the camera in such a manner as to practically surround it with a chamber, the air in which is heated, as by an alcohol lamp 16, causing a circulation through the space 4 around the camera 6, situated in the compartment 5—air being admitted at 17 and escaping through 19. 14 is the non-heat conducting covering, and 2 a hinged cover.

Mr. Cronjager states that with this apparatus he has exposed fifteen thousand feet of motion picture film, in midwinter in the woods in Maine, without once breaking the film, and the resulting negatives have been entirely free from "static flashes." He has also made an exposure in the woods during a snow storm at 5 p. m. with almost all light gone and thereby obtained a full time negative. Thus obviously the invention may be used to advantage with cameras ordinarily employed for single exposures, as its use increases the speed of the film, enabling good negatives to be obtained with little light and improving the quality and tone of negatives. The claims are strong, basic in fact.

past a special commissioner sent by a foreign nation to gather data in regard to our patent system, in response to an inquiry as to why his people desired a patent system, replied that the question has arisen, "What makes the United States such a great nation? And we investigated and found it was patents, and we will have patents."



W. Heath Robinson's geometrical protest against Cubistic art tendencies is worthy of reproduction here, not so much on account of its originality (as such circular singumstances are primeval in character and antedate paleolithic culture, whereas the new fad is presumably futuristic), but rather as demonstrating the wealth of expression and symbolism that may be attained by the simple and exclusive use of the compasses by which we circumscribe our desires and round out our existences. Inversely speaking, Robinson and other Roundites seek to circle the square, and totally ignore the possibility of a fourth dimension. The Cubists have one attribute in common with the circle, however—their productions apparently lack beginning or end.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

I HAVE been repeatedly asked for an opinion regarding the possible effect of the "Talking Picture" upon "Picture Music." While I do not feel able to forecast the future of the "Talking Picture," I feel that the time is far distant when the two will be competitive. The talking picture in its present status should be an inducement to good picture music and create a greater chain of large picture theatres, charging a larger admission, which alone are able to maintain good music. The "Talking Picture" is a novelty of merit and runs about 15 minutes on the bill of the Keith houses at the present time, showing two subjects, which would hardly constitute a show for a picture theatre. It is again a fact that to a great extent the picture must be sacrificed in catering to the recording of the speeches and dialogue, which fact alone can assure us that the silent drama or picture is far from doomed even if they can make the picture talk. The cost of service for an entire show is another fact in our favor. Personally I cannot believe that the "Talking Picture" and "Picture Music" can ever clash (granting that we will soon have picture music), but will assist each other, one being the medium for the success of the other.

It has always been a source of thought and worry for the exhibitor or theatre manager, as to the obtaining of the best results with an orchestra in picture theatres and it is not as yet solved. To feature a worthy picture musically it is necessary that the music opens and continues through the entire picture, which is practically impossible for a show of five pictures, knowing that a certain amount of rest is positively necessary and essential to the rendering of good music.

We will therefore never have the advanced picture music until this is possible.

If a theatre's picture film service included two or three talking subjects it would be a decided step toward making the aforementioned possible, for it would immediately solve the musical intermission problem. With a slight strain upon my imagination I can picture an ideal picture theatre showing three silent pictures properly set to music, together with three talking subjects, which would act as musical interruption. A theatre so supplied would surely be able to give its patrons full value for their money and an enjoyable performance. While I have no reason to believe that such may or will be the case, at present I find consolation in the fact that it will be some time before the "Talking Picture" can supply the demand wherewith to be able to injure "Picture Music." Let us hope they will be brothers and the means of creating more ideal and high-class picture theatres.

There are many pictures which do not musically inspire, in which case it is hardly possible that I could set appropriate music to any greater advantage than the average musician. When the musical inspiration is lacking in the picture, play numbers which do not clash with the picture rhythm, that can be well rendered by your respective combinations.

BILLY QUIRK IN "BILLY'S SUICIDE"
Gem comedy release April 29th.

In Scenics or Educationals splendid opportunities are afforded for the rendition of numbers which will show your true ability.

There are still many releases wherein the director labors under the illusion that he can and should portray two distinctly different kinds of action at the same time, in which case it is for you to decide which is more important to the picture plot and follow it. The chances are that the picture will fall flat, but it is usually doomed to the same fate, music or no music.

In a recent article wherein I made mention of the Vitagraph Feature release, "The Incarnation of Karma," I erred in quoting Rosemary Theby being cast as Karma. The name of the character portrayed by Rosemary Theby should have read "Quinatrea."

The Vitagraph Company releases on April 9th "Out of the Storm," a picture that affords all kinds of opportunities for effects. It is a beautiful picture with a genuine storm, burglary, love and passion. Everything you could ask for in a thousand feet of film. Rosemary Theby is also cast in this picture, which is an assurance that the picture will inspire. She does not appear in pictures of the posing, look-me-over or is-my-make-up-on-straight kind.

CORRESPONDENCE

A. C., Chicago, Ill.—I am glad to note that you are meeting with success in selecting repertoire from Picture Thematics. It bas been the experience of every musician that after buying or selecting 500 numbers at random, one-half or less have made good repertoire. The numbers mentioned in the News are selected after a trial with pictures with an orchestra, and are all worthy of the necessary effort to properly play them. The fact that they are specially selected will materially reduce the cost of music for tbe player.

M. A., Madisonville, Ky.—Any courtesies extended to the picture musician tbrough the columns of the News should and does apply to you. Be governed accordingly. In the near future when the picture player shows a more general interest in his work and produces better music, I have hopes of obtaining all professicnal courtesies for them, such as are extended to the advanced professional.

PICTURE THEMATICS OF MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS

My Old Wedding Gown, by Lee Orean Smith. A beautiful Valse Lento movement, positively indispensable in picture playing. Is strictly legato. For visions of sentimental nature, for quiet action on scenes depicting regret or longing. The most beautiful effect is obtained when playing number in slow tempo. The number was composed witb a view of expressing a sentimental thought. Published by Leo Feist, Mus. Pub., 134 W. 37th St., New York City. Price, Piano copy 15c; Orcbestration 25c.

Silvery Bells, by George Botsford. The snow scene pictures are now being released and you will find no better instrumental orcbestra number for tbe perfect suggestion of snow or sleighing. Pub. by J. H. Remick, 219 W. 46th St., New York City. Price, Piano 10c; Orcbestration 15c.

Berceuse Tendre, by Leo Danierff. A beautifully odd number that is well adapted for love or other sentimental scenes in the more advanced pictures. An excellent preparatory number leading up to dramatic action or relieving it. Is different from the usual melodious sentimental number and not difficult. Pub. by Jos. W. Stern, Mus. Pub., 102 W. 38th St., New York City. Price, Piano 25c; Orchestration 25c.

Album for Moving Picture Pianists, compiled by Geo. Smith. Pub. by Carl Fischer, 48-50 Cooper Square, New York City. Tbe above album is just from the press and is by far the best picture pianists, especially those new to the business, tban anything beretofore published. It contains 85 numbers of every character and description, including dramatic. Every number is well arranged and complete. Personally I do not approve of picture music in bound form, but with a little judgment this folio can be disconnected in manner, making it possible to use every number. All enthusiastic picture pianists should have this album. It contains appropriate numbers for any picture that can be released. Price 80 cents.

He also publishes a "Moving Picture Folio" for orchestra containing 58 numbers which is excellent. I use it in disconnected form and bave no difficulty with it. For those who are beginning to collect music for pictures tbis folio is valuable. Orchestra leaders having older libraries should write and get synopsis of this folio to avoid duplicating their repertoire. Space will not permit me to give it. The same numbers will be found in orch. folio as are in pianists' album. Price for Orchestration 10c and Piano $2.50.

HETTIE GRAY BAKER VISITS SELIG PLANT

Miss Hettie Gray Baker, of Hartford, Conn., author of many popular and artistic Selig photodramas, among them "Salley in our Ally" and "Old Songs and Memories," stopped off in Chicago, last week, on her way to California. During her stay in the western metropolis, she was a much-interested visitor at the Selig Studios where she witnessed the production of an elaborate picture by Oscar Eagle, the scenario for which Miss Baker recently wrote.

SNAPSHOTS—WOMEN'S VIEWS OF VITAL INTEREST TO MOVING PICTURE TRADE

By Mary Lawton Metcalfe

President Eccnomics and Politics Club, New York City Federation.

With absolutely no apology, I am rising out of the sequestered corner of Greater New York to tell the trade of the storm of adverse criticism which has been brewing in the women's civic clubs, since the recent accidents. Proposed bills in city and state have been in the public eye.

Friday, the seventh of February, 1913, was a great day in the club world of New York City women. Beginning at ten a. m., and continuing in three sessions until midnight, the Tenth Annual Convention of the New York City Federation was an important function of one thousand delegates and alternates: these women voted the instructions of eighty thousand women.

Among the resolutions offered was one from a club, whose delegate made an impassioned plea to the Convention to take action against the peril to children in moving picture theatres. Not only for new safeguards to preserve life, but morality.

The speaker was so earnest that, though an unmarried woman, she was almost in tears in reciting the dangers of all kinds in the dark rooms of moving picture audiences.

On the stage was one of the most beautiful women I have ever seen. Her placid lovely countenance crowned with braids of white hair made a fit subject for a picture of mature American gentlewoman. This was Miss Laura Skinner, one of the Vice-presidents of the Federation. Miss Skinner asked for recognition from the president, Mrs. William Grant Brown, and addressed the audience now thoroughly aroused against moving picture theatres by the agitated speech of the delegate from a Brooklyn club.

Miss Skinner stated that she, as a censor, had witnessed thousands and thousands of films during the last few years, and her testimony is that Cinematograph films are the greatest invention of the age. She said also how very few films were manufactured now that have to be condemned. The whole danger of the theatres was conceded to be in the public stampede from fire panic.

The audience relaxed somewhat. Mrs. Charles Metcalfe, president of Economics and Politics Club was recognized and permitted to speak on the resolution. Mrs. Metcalfe said:

It is the hope in this Federation to develop every dance hall of the people into a civic center. Excellent work has been done along these lines on Staten Island.

My club knows that just such development can be made of the moving picture theatre in every section. Personally I selected films and directed matinees at the Odeon Theatre, Staten Island, on Saturday mornings from ten to twelve o'clock, giving talks to the school-children and suggesting the books to ask for at the public library. The detectives of the Police Department were sent to break up the matinee, as it was against the law for children under sixteen to go in a moving picture place unaccompanied. As the law stands now, there is no difference between educational matinees and lectures by parents and teachers and the ordinary Wild West thrillers.

Mrs. Metcalfe urged the clubs to call on the proprietors of theatres, and assured them that, even from a business point of view, the men would respond to requests for such films as help in higher education and entertainment of audiences.

In the interim of the sessions, I talked with mothers, to feel the pulse of sentiment pro and con. Many are very much agitated on the subject, since the white slave revelations have been published. All recognize the value of truth taught in films, but now it is a matter of bad air, improper audiences and fire danger.

I believe it is a psychological crisis with the trade. It will be a survival of the fittest. Uncanny places are going to be sufferers.

It seems passing strange that gilt edge firms do not realize the value of representative women to present the true ideals of Cinematography. Thousands of misses or "young ladies" in their teens are considered qualified to give interviews to inquiring visitors. And some of the "small fry"—boys between seventeen and twenty—are quite impossible.

I am not surprised that the laity are disgusted and unconvinced after interviews with illiterate office interviewers.

At the New Plaza Theatre, Staten Island, the Economics and Politics Club presented three films with the stories told by the president—Mrs. Metcalfe.

"The Child of the Ghetto" carries a powerful message, especially at this time, when so many girls are caught up in the wreckage of human life and whirled away by the vice trust. The "Cotton Industry" and "Indian Legend" completed the films which were secured from the Educational Department of the General Film Company.

This entertainment was protected by the Plaza license but the police lieutenant in a heated argument with Mrs. Metcalfe asserts that there can be no educational work done in moving picture theatres. The police recognize them only as hot-beds of iniquity.

A moral tidal wave seems to have struck the Police Department when it refused to recognize a recommendation of Mr. Wallace, Bureau of Licenses, to grant Mrs. Metcalfe exemption from police interference at the educational matinees with Edison films. Dance halls are allowed to become civic centres, but moving picture theatres are held in holy horror, even by Commissioner Waldo's henchmen.

AN IMPRESSION OF RODMAN LAW

By M. I. MacDonald

The first few flashes one gets of an individuality, with the mind laid open to receive them, are usually correct. Sometimes a prejudice has previously crept in, causing the inner self to be unresponsive and unwilling to comunicate in any way with the psychic portion of the opposite individual, leaving only the taint of a prejudice, over which, in some minds, not even the reflection of an impression has the slightest power.

So much for the philosophy of impressions. Now let us to our subject, Rodman Law. The name and portrait of Rodman Law has appeared frequently in the newspapers of our country. He has posed in dare-devil feats of all kinds for our motion picture cameras. He has been paid fabulous sums of money for the exploitation of this dare-deviltry for the entertainment of the public, and not long ago the writer happened in a motion picture theatre where a film of one of his hair-breadth escapes from death was preceded by a short address from the young man of the iron nerve, which received a storm of applause that might have been accorded one of the orators of our country.

Speaking of nerve, or nerves, Rodman Law in answer to a remark which suggested that nerves were foreign to his make-up, answered that on the contrary he is a bundle of what his doctor terms "hairspring" nerves.

However, be his nerves as they may, the two dominating factors of Rodman Law's dare-devil life are fearlessness and power of concentration. When you talk to him he seems to be looking above you, and beyond. Nor is his glance evasive, by any means, but he is apparently in a sphere of his own, which perhaps none of us quite understand, a sphere of dizzy heights and fearful depths, and thrilling leaps, one from which others shrink in terror, but over which, for the time, Rodman Law stands conqueror.

And over his sphere reason also stands supreme. Rodman Law refuses to consign himself to space, unless Nature and her elements are with him. Each move he makes in every one of his dare-devil feats has been calculated on beforehand, and it almost seems as though his success spells self-hypnotism.

There is a lesson in the life of this youth for every one of us. Could there be a more potent lesson in concentration than is exemplified in his work?

A RAMO STORY

In producing motion picture plays, "cuts," or shortenings of scene, nearly always have to be made, for no matter how experienced or able may have been the direction of the picture, nothing but running off the picture will reveal the weak and tiresome scenes of action. Frequently the alterations are of a radical nature, though it is not often they go as far as that suggested by Wray Physioc, the youthful manager of the new Ramo Film concern.

Physioc was present at the exhibition of one of his new pictures, "The Black Opal." While the picture was being run in the private exhibition room, a great noise of sawing was audible in an adjoining room. "What's all that sawing?" Physioc asked. "I don't know," replied the operator, "but I think it's Billy Davis cutting one of his negatives."

JUST GOSSIP

By The Mahoney

Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis.

At the hearing of Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill vs. P. A. Powers, before Justice Bijur of the Supreme Court, regarding the rights of certain Wild West pictures, the irrepressible Pat dropped the action, and is reported to have remarked: "Why, the whole trouble is, everyone has the false idea there's lots of money in the moving picture business."

The Mahoney's eye wandered to another contemporaneous paragraph, sadly at variance with P. A.'s contention.

"Allan Swan, in charge of the American Film Mfg. Co.'s studio, drove into Santa Barbara last week in his new six thousand dollar, ninety horsepower roadster. It will be used by Mr. Swan in scouting for locations."

Then in the dim vista came a "dissolve" to a letter dated February , 1911, addressed to a friend of The Mahoney, which read:

"Thanks for your cheque. May be able to do as much for you some day. 'Quien sabe?' Am enclosing a more sane version of my scenario, 'The Cigar Band.' Trust it may be available." Allan was a budding scenario writer at that time. That he has more than made good is amply attested by the excellence of the American's Western product.

We are not alone in our bickerings. Staid and conservative England is in the throes of a great upheaval. Recent advices from the land of fairness and conservatism report:

"We have three organizations for publishing and handling films in this country. The Tyler, Ltd., the Cosmopolitan, Ltd., and the Gerrard, Ltd., and if a film has any merit at all, it will command an excellent sale. Just at present trade over here is in a very curious state. Pathe has gone out on his own account, and won't sell to the renters, and to counteract this, the manufacturers are forming a combination, and talk of making a thirteen months' license on their films. The theatres and exhibitors don't like either proposition, and business in consequence is badly affected."

Come on! Come on! Where are they? We're looking for them. "Prairie," "Monitor," "Monarch," "Anchor," "Ammex," "Ryno," and others heralded and promised months ago.

Get in line. There's room for all, and more too, and let it be a survival of the fittest.

Mahoney Hudson Liston, a pioneer recruit from the ranks of the legitimate stage to the motion picture industry, has recently returned from a long road season with "Bunty." Hudson, whose dramatic talent and adaptable sure fire personality, for special character parts requiring strength and virility, dates back in the pictures to the time when Theodore Wharton arranged seven and eight minute themes for the Biograph, and Wallace McCutcheon (God bless his ponderous proportions) superintended their production, in West 22nd Street, and afterwards on the roof of a building at Thirteenth and Broadway.

Hudson was recently prominent as Brownlow in Oliver Twist, with Nat Goodwin.

Some men (and women too) are born scenario writers—
Some achieve scenario writing—
And some have scenario writing thrust upon them.
Ha! Ha!

With apologies to the Bard; not forgetting "William Lord," the Dean of Authors on the Art of Scenario Writing, for encroaching.

Rattling Cinematography Bones.

A meeting with Mahoney Frank Russell, who for two decades and more has been prominent in stage affairs in many capacities, recalls the following:

Early in 1895, on the roof of the Grand Central Palace, one of the first motion pictures produced in this country (The Passion Play) was staged from a scenario arranged by Frank Russell. Ed Porter was an active instrument in the development of the story, and the camera used was an improvised affair made by a Mr. Paley. Alfred Eaves was the costumer. Frank Russell portrayed the Savior, Fred Strong was the Pilate, and the late John B. Studley, Herod. Mr. Hollaman of the Eden Musee financed the venture, and the film was exhibited for quite some time, at the Musee.

The supply of suitable themes must be sadly lacking, judging from several subjects recently encountered by The Mahoney in his wanderings. He was present at the filming of a half-reel comedy, released by the American Film Mfg. Co., March 15, 1911, entitled: "Do You Know This Woman?" in which Warren (Jack) Kerrigan and Dot Farley were seen as husband and wife.

A prominent Patents Company manufacturer recently placed upon the market the same identical story without even the minutest change of detail, and called it: "Whose Wife Is This?"

* * * *

If the reformers and moralists would turn their attention to some of the suggestive situations in current plays, instead of advocating censors for motion pictures, their endeavors might be of some benefit to the community at large.

A more torrid piece of "suggestive bric-a-brac" is hard to imagine than one photograph displayed in front of a prominent Broadway theatre, illustrative of a scene in "Romance."

Some time ago we witnessed a play at Hoyt's Madison Square Theatre. It had a wonderful cast. You will agree that it was a wonderful cast, when The Mahoney tells you the names of the principal actors.

Joseph Haworth (since deceased), then in the zenith of his career, one of the most human actors of his or any other time.

Theodore Roberts, whose wonderful characterizations have made him world-famous.

Horace Lewis (also deceased), another character actor of distinction.

Guy Standing. My! What a picture he was in full tights and spangles.

Sam Reed, and Louis Massen.

VITAGRAPH

A WINDOW ON WASHINGTON PARK (April 30).—From his apartment window, overlooking Washington Park Alan Dale sees a refined but poverty-stricken old gentleman on one of the park benches. Calling his butler, he instructs him to go to town and tell the old man he would like to see him. Alan's sympathy is aroused by the poor man's appearance and a desire for companionship in his loneliness. Since the death of his wife, he has lived alone in his apartments and leads a comparatively cheerless existence. When the butler approaches the elderly man and delivers his message, the old fellow is somewhat skeptical, but finally consents to go with him. Alan receives his guest cordially and tells him why he has requested him to come to him, and adds that he would be pleased to have him dine with him. Alan's manner is so pleasant and sincere the visitor is immediately made at home, and consents to accept the invitation. During the meal, the old man tells his life's story; how he married a young woman, and after the birth of a little daughter, she died. How his daughter had married a young fellow and gone to live in New York, and how, through unfortunate speculation, he had lost his money, and was unable to keep track of her. The last news he had received of his daughter was of her death. As he recites his story visions of the events appear before us and we have no trouble following them.

Alan can hardly wait until his guest has finished, and at the conclusion of the story he eagerly grasps the old gentleman's hand and tells him that he is his grandson, his daughter's son. There is mutual rejoicing of the two. Mr. Alan tells his grandfather that he must share his home with him and be his chum.

KINEMACOLOR

A SHATTERED IDEAL.—A Kinemacolor comedy, full of laughs, but with a distinct plot.

Jean Fabre, an artist seeking to paint a great picture, cannot find a model who possesses all the qualities he desires, so he uses one for the figure, one for the face, and another for the hair. The result is a picture which wins a great prize.

Bradley, a rich society man, loves a beautiful girl, Ethel, until, during a visit to an art exhibition, he sees the great painting. He can hardly tear himself away from it, even to pay due attention to his betrothed. Finally he writes, asking for an appointment to meet the model, declaring she is the only woman he can marry.

The artist has long loved Ethel, but felt it hopeless, until he shows the letter from Bradley. Mother and daughter are furious, but the girl concocts a scheme. Bradley is summoned to the studio next day, but before he arrives the models have all been made hideous. The girl with the beautiful face has been padded into enormous proportions; the girl with the hair has been turned into an old witch; the girl of the figure has been blackened into a negress.

Upon Bradley's arrival, the artist confesses that he used three models. At first the man is stunned, but declares that among them he surely can find the woman of his dreams. So the girls are brought in, one by one. Horror follows on horror until the culmination, when the negress enters. Seizing his hat, the frantic man rushes home. In the studio mirth reigns, the models are well paid for their work, and while the mother helps them to become once more their normal selves, Ethel says "yes" to the old question, which is ever new.

Bradley receives back his ring from Ethel, with a note telling him to put it on the finger of his ideal. With the picture turned to the wall, "a sadder, but wiser man" sits before the fire where, in a vision, he sees the happiness of Jean and Ethel.

HIS BROTHER'S KEEPER.—Thrilling Kinemacolor drama, located in the East and the West. It is the old story of two brothers loving the same girl, but treated in a novel manner.

Tired of the farm, the younger brother decides to go West, so the elder goes with him. Their little sweetheart loves the younger, Jim, but to both boys gives her photograph, writing on the backs:

"May each be his brother's keeper.—Mary."

In the West, the brothers prosper. Ben, the elder, works hard, but Jim spends his time in the dance halls with Denver Dolly. A quarrel ensues, and the brothers separate. While looking at Mary's photo, Ben reads the message, and feels he has not done his duty. He finds Jim at the saloon, but receives a shot Jim meant for Curley, another lover of Dolly's. Thinking he has killed his brother, Jim escapes. Dolly takes Ben to her house and nurses him back to life. Under his influence she reforms, refuses to join her former companions, and shows her real fine nature. Jim, driven to desperation by his conscience and hunger, gives himself up. The sheriff is away, and the half-drunken cowboys, led by Curley, decide to hang Jim. Word is brought to Dolly, who takes Mary's photo and goes to save Jim.

Now comes intense suspense as we go from Jim to Dolly. The preparations for the hanging and her frantic efforts to stop them. She arrives just as the rope is to be drawn, tells her story, shows Mary's photograph, and finally persuades the boys to let Jim go.

GAUMONT

THE SHOE ON THE OTHER FOOT (April 29).—Mr. Pumpernickel installs his son and brand-new daughter-in-law in a house which he owns. In the same building lives a music-mad policeman. The copper has powerful lungs. It is probable that he has more music in his breath than in his soul. Every time he plays, the melody is so powerful that he shakes the house, which rocks like a ship in a gale. Persons in various parts of the building have the pleasure of seeing their family heirlooms topple over. There is destruction generally.

Young Mr. Pumpernickel's excellent father tells the policeman that he will have to vacate or shut up. The policeman, angered that his art is not valued, determines that he will get even. When young Mrs. Pumpernickel goes out into the street where the policeman is patroling his beat, he arrests her after she has refused to pick up a piece of paper which she has thrown on the street. This action is a violation of the highway ordinance. Mrs. Pumpernickel is so prostrated after she has been bailed out that she is hysterical. When she goes home she takes to her bed.

A doctor is called. After hearing details he prescribes complete rest and quietness, and that a policeman be obtained whom she can torture every morning for a week.

A dummy is made of a policeman, they being unable to find a live one who will consent to being tortured in the morning. Young Mrs. Pumpernickel and her kin punch the bloomin' 'ead off the dummy, stick their fingers in his eyes and bite their initials in his cheeks. There is a hole in the partition between the apartment of the policeman and that of the young Pumpernickels. The policeman looks through and sees the indignities being practiced upon the effigy. He enters the apartment surreptitiously when the Pumpernickels are absent. He carries out the dummy and takes its place. When the Pumpernickels return and take up their exercises upon the supposed dummy, the "dummy" suddenly comes to life. Then the invalid has another shock for her already outraged nerves.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE (May 1).—The interest of the manager and assistant manager of a large department store for one of their minor employees is of a strong nature. The manager is highest in her affections.

The credit of the store is low and the manager seeks to retrieve fallen fortunes by speculations on the stock market. He uses the company's money, but speculates in his own name.

The assistant manager hears of this and exposes his superior to the directors of the company. The manager's act, although his motive is good, is criminal on the surface. He is sent to jail.

His sweetheart, the store-woman, is heart-broken and determines that the wrong done him by his rival will not be unavenged.

She encourages the courtship of the assistant manager, who has been promoted to the managership. She proves to be very expensive, developing a taste for diamonds and other costly things. So wrecked is his fortune by these extravagances that he decides to rob the department store safe.

The girl, believing that this is his intention, notifies the directors of the company and the police. They catch the manager in the act. The girl appears on the scene and tells the manager that she has led him on to his ruin, that she never loved him, and that her heart is with the man who is still in prison and that she has long plotted to put him where he had put her fiance.

THE MAN FROM THE CITY (April 21).—Virginia Lewis receives word from her relations in the city that her grandfather has left his entire estate to her providing she claims it within a certain date. She prepares to go to town at once and in a letter to her aunt states that she should have her cousin meet her at the depot, wearing a white carnation.

Ralph, her grandfather's disinherited ward, hears of this and sets about to find some way in which he can hold her until it will be too late to claim the estate, which will then revert to him. The cousin's motor car, on the way to the depot, suffers a breakdown, and in consequence is much delayed. Ralph arrives first, wearing the white flower, and the girl willingly goes with him. Once in his home, she realizes the trap. She tries to escape, but Ralph and his wife prevent this. One day she writes a note and flings it out of the window. It is found by John Davis, a city fellow who knew Virginia in her country home. He rushes for assistance—but Ralph has seen him and takes Virginia away in a motor car. John's car is soon flying after them and there is an exciting chase through the town. But the girl is finally rescued and enabled to claim her estate in time, while Ralph and his wife are apprehended and arrested.

And the man from the city resumes his romance with the girl from the country.

son for going swimming and not telling the truth about it. Taking the boy to his room, he walks down to the village. A woman recently widowed goes to collect her insurance money. On the way home she stops to do some shopping and drops her purse.

The deacon, who has come to town to beg for an extension on his mortgage, is refused, and is returning home in a very dejected frame of mind.

He sees the purse at his feet. Knowing to whom it belongs—he cannot withstand the temptation. He takes the money and throws the empty purse away. This is found by a young chap, who picks it up to take to his wife. The widow informs the sheriff, who finds the purse in the young chap's possession. He knows nothing of the money and is arrested on suspicion. When the deacon arrives home he finds his boy dying of pneumonia. He thinks this is a judgment upon him for his hypocrisy and deceit. He takes the money and rushes with it to the widow, confessing the temptation.

The young fellow is released and exonerated and the widow, out of pity, prevails upon the hard-hearted rich man to give the deacon the time he needs on his mortgage.

It is not long before the boy is on the road to recovery, to his father's great joy.

NOT FOR MINE (April 22).—Betty is engaged to Bob and everything was running smoothly until Betty went to spend a couple of days with her married cousin. Elsa had three children—beautiful little things—of course—but very imps of mischief.

Betty, for so long used to a quiet life, found it very hard to stand their noise and pranks. To her great surprise the father and mother merely laugh.

Finally, unable to bear it any longer, Betty catches the last car for town. In the car she discovers that Elsa's youngest, who had been playing with her purse, abstracted all the coin. She hasn't even enough to pay her fare. The good-looking young chap who comes to her assistance proves a masher, and this incident adds to her discomfort.

Arriving home, her first act is to call Billy up to notify him that marriage is not a state of bliss and she has decided not to enter it!

Billy, utterly disheartened, resolves to commit suicide. He has a rope about his neck, a bottle of poison in one hand and a revolver in the other, when the 'phone rings. It is Betty, who has called up to say that she has changed her mind again.

With a whoop of joy Billy fires the gun and pitches the bottle through the window!

RELIANCE

THE SHE WOLF (April 19).—Jules, a trapper, is in love with Toinette, wife of Pierre. Pierre goes to the trading post, leaving Toinette and her little girl, Marie, alone. Jules tries to force an entrance into the cabin but Toinette bolts the door. Later, thinking him gone, she sends Marie outdoors to gather chips. This is his chance—for, he argues, "Take the cub and the she wolf will follow." He picks up the little one and races through the woods with her. Toinette, gun in hand, follows, but she dare not shoot, as he uses the child as a shield, protecting himself with her body. Then suddenly Jules steps into a bear trap and is held captive. The mother catches the child to her heart and rushes home.

Pierre passes on his way from town and, seeing Jules, he frees him. Toinette puts her baby to bed and listens to her evening prayer, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." But she is not ready to forgive yet. Taking her gun she goes out to shoot the man who is caught in the bear trap. To her surprise she finds her husband with Jules. She explains the terrible ordeal of the afternoon and, in awful fury, Pierre turns upon the other man, ready to kill. Then it is that her baby's prayer softens the mother's heart. She stays her husband's hand. They return home, leaving Jules' fate in the hands of Providence.

At the sleeping baby's bedside father and mother offer a prayer of thanksgiving for her safety and their satisfaction is the greater because no man's blood is upon their hands.

THE HOODOO PEARLS (April 23).—John Mason and Fred Ellis are in love with their employer's daughter. She prefers Mason, however. On the day before Mason leaves for his vacation, a string of pearls is delivered to their employer, Dallas, with the request that he keep these so-called "hoodoo" pearls in his safe. By some accident the pearls are dropped into the big ledger and repose there snugly while Dallas places the empty box in the safe. When Dallas leaves the office, Mason enters, to finish his preparations for going away on the morrow. Next day, Dallas finds the empty box. Mason was the last man in the office and suspicion points to him. Ellis, glancing through the ledger, finds the pearls. Resolving to disgrace his rival, he takes them home. His sister, unknown to him, wears them to a ball and loses them. Ellis is almost crazed, but the necklace is finally discovered.

Early the next morning he places the "hoodoo" pearls where he found them, in the ledger, and calls Dallas' attention to them. The employer remembers then that it was all due to his own carelessness. Mason is released and, as Ellis sees him take the girl he loves into his arms, he no longer feels any pangs of jealousy but just relief that the fatal pearls are locked securely in the safe.

THANHOUSER

FOR ANOTHER'S SIN (April 25).—A young bank clerk lived beyond his means, associated with vicious companions and finally attempted to pay his debts by "borrowing" the funds entrusted to his care. His fate was the usual one, and ten years later, when he emerged from prison, a physical wreck, he realized that his follies were not worth the price he paid. He was practically penniless, and old friends shunned him. After many struggles he secured a subordinate position in the bank where he formerly had been employed, and for a time worked diligently, unheeding the snubs and sneers of the other clerks, who were either honest or had not been found out.

Among the employees was a young teller, the only person in the bank who was decently civil to the ex-convict. The teller, sad to relate, was in rough waters himself. He dearly loved his wife and longed for the day when she would have silks, diamonds and a retinue of servants. Hoping to realize his dreams he thought of speculation and, like the other man, "borrowed" the money over which he was guardian.

That very day his crime found him out, for the bank examiner paid an unexpected visit. The teller was called in, questioned, and was on the verge of making a confession when the ex-convict entered the room and said he was the guilty man. The only one who could not understand was the teller, for he had the money in his own pocket at the time. A second later the ex-convict slipped a note in the teller's hand. In it he explained that a prison term would make the teller "a friendless wreck like myself." The ex-convict knew his days were numbered, and was willing to sacrifice himself to save another from becoming an outcast. The teller accepted the sacrifice, for he had a wife dependent upon him. The other man was lonely and friendless, but the good deed he did lived after him, for the teller never forgot that the liberty he enjoyed was won by his pledge to be an honest, upright man for the rest of his days.

FRONTIER

THE WORD OF JOSE (May 1).—Blessing, a bad man of some brains and ability, steals a horse and doctors the brand. Jose, a young Mexican of considerable wealth, is induced to buy the animal by his fiancee, Ynez, who fancies the animal and wants him for a wedding gift. Jose, who is a friend of the sheriff, "Smiling" Charlie Buck, is suspicious of the brand on the horse, but as Ynez insists upon it he buys him for her.

Jose and Ynez visit town, Ynez riding in on the horse. Burns, the band inspector, secs them and, finding the horse to answer a description posted sometime before, takes the whole party in charge. They go to the sheriff's office, and there Jose succeeds in having Buck, as a favor to him, free Ynez, Jose himself telling the story of his having bought the horse from Blessing.

Several loungers who saw Burns arrest Jose and Ynez, rush into the hotel and declare that Buck has caught the horsethief for whom the reward was offered. This causes a large amount of excitement, and Blessing entering in time to observe it, decides to turn it to his own advantage in fastening the guilt upon the innocent Jose. He therefore incites the mob to riot, and when they are ripe for it, starts a lynching bee with Jose as the intended victim. Warned by Burns, Buck has prepared for this, sending Jose away. Jose has pledged his word to return when sent for and the sheriff tells him he will send word to Ynez when to come.

The mob comes to the sheriff's office and after a while finds that Jose is gone. Buck and Burns, however, delay them until Jose has a good start. Jose rides to Ynez's home and there she conceals him on the roof to such good intent that the pursuing mobsmen do not find him. They return to town disgusted.

Buck sends for Jose. Ynez gets the letter and is torn by her love of Jose and her desire to have him prove the man he seems. Love wins, and she begs him to fly with her. Mindful of his word, Jose hesitates. Ynez is stung by his hesitation and tells him to keep his word to Buck then, since he has failed in his vows to her. Jose, despondent, starts for the town and trial.

Ynez decides to follow Jose and seek forgiveness. Jose, though, has a long lead, and she does not catch him. Blessing attempts to kill Buck, with whom he has had trouble, and Jose arrives just in time to prevent it. An exciting chase follows, ending, as it should, in the clearing of Jose from the charge of theft and the fastening of the guilt upon Blessing, its rightful owner, who, however, has been killed.

Jose and Ynez are united and she loves him more than ever because he had held his word so highly.

"ALKALI" IKE'S HOMECOMING (April 19).—During Alkali Ike's visit to the East, Slippery Slim made rapid progress for the hand of Soffie Clutts. On this particular day in February, Slippery Slim is very much dejected when he calls on Soffie and discovers that she is admiring several photographs of her old friend, Alkali. To give him better sailing, Slim shows Soffie a fictitious note, stating that Alkali Ike died that day. Soffie's old love returns, she dashes madly from the house, leaving her suitor bewildered, rushes to the general store, where she purchases several yards of crepe, some black dress material and a box of mourning handkerchiefs, also a floral piece. That afternoon the boys on the ranch receive a telegram stating that Alkali Ike will arrive that day. He is met at the train by the Lizardville band and a group of cowboys, who give him a welcoming never to be forgotten. Alkali Ike's first thought was of Soffie. He goes to his bunk house, where he sheds his citizen's clothes and dons his chaps, flannel shirt and Stetson hat. He is overwhelmed when he sees the floral piece with the following inscription, "To my beloved Alkali Ike:—Died February 2nd, 1913." He rushes madly to Soffie's home where, upon looking through the window, he discovers Slippery Slim trying to console the weeping miss. Slim discovers Alkali at the window, takes another good look and leaves hurriedly. Alkali enters. Soffie, overjoyed, throws her arms about him and claims the smiling Westerner for her own.

THE RETURN OF CRIME (2 Reels) (April 30).—Martha Elliot, a young music student, meets and falls in love with Lucien Grey, who is just entering upon a promising career as a physician. After a brief interval of happiness Grey deserts the girl. Martha soon afterwards finds herself forced to provide a living for two in a world where the best she can do can barely maintain one. She is deeply embittered toward the perfidious father and this bitterness she communicates to her son. The boy reaches manhood and proceeds to carve out for himself a career in the law. Martha, by this time a middle-aged and chronic invalid, lives only for her brilliant and successful son. Her joy in him is gloriously crowned when he is elected to the office of district attorney.

The sensation of many weeks is furnished one morning when the newspapers print in full-page headlines the story of the arrest, on a criminal charge, of the eminent and wealthy surgeon, Lucien Grey. Elliot, who knows the man to be his delinquent parent, inflamed as he is with hatred against the man whom he holds responsible for his mother's years of disgrace, hardship and want, and for the resulting illness which has blighted her later life, resolves to prosecute the case in person. His passionate hatred seems to inspire him, so he carries out his intention with such relentless skill and astuteness that, although the evidence is flimsy, Grey is soon lodged in the death-cell awaiting execution.

The harrowing days during which the case is in progess so tell upon Martha Elliot's condition that her malady is seriously aggravated. At last she succumbs to the strain. A consultation of experts declare that the woman's one chance for life lies in a piece of surgery which none of them has the skill to attempt. Lucien Grey, who is awaiting the law's extreme penalty in the state prison, is the only man who can perform it.

When Elliot discovers the fact, he goes secretly to the prison and, relying on his close resemblance to his father to shield them from detection, he releases the latter and sends him to the dying woman's bedside. He himself takes the prisoner's place in the cell. Grey arrives in time to save Martha Elliot's life. But, just as he is in the middle of his delicate task the lights go out. There is no moment to be lost. The hour is approaching when the warden will open the cell-door and lead the occupant forth to death. Grey gropes his way to the switchboard in the hallway, but can do nothing. In his extremity of despair he prays. Instantly his hands find out the right switch in the darkness. He finishes his work and rushes back to the prison. But Elliot's fiancee, Alice Lee, fearing the truth, namely, that the young lawyer's successful prosecution was actuated by personal animosity rather than by legal justice, has already secured a reprieve for the prisoner from the governor. Grey finds his cell empty and himself a free man.

PEARL AS A DETECTIVE (May 4).—Chester is engaged to Grace. He had just received a letter at his office from Laura Gaines, the sister of a chum of his. The letter was on two sheets asking Chester on the first sheet to help her in a business deal, and arranging for an appointment on the second sheet, which bore her signature. Chester knocks this last sheet off his desk. Grace visits him and finds the compromising paper. She goes home. Chester telephones her that important business will keep him away that evening. She waxes suspicious and calls up Finder & Pinchem Detective Agency. They assign Pearl, the girl detective, to the case. She trails Chester and reports to Grace that he dines at a hotel with a woman. She then goes to Chester's office and gets a job there as stenographer. The next day Chester gets a letter from Miss Gaines asking him to meet her again. Pearl gets the letter and immediately takes it to Grace. Grace, when Chester calls that evening, is very cold to him and he is at a loss to understand. Pearl, believing her mission accomplished, wants to resign from her job, but Chester won't let her. Grace, sorry for the way she treated Chester, decides to call at his office. However, Pearl and Chester have grown very fond of each other and when Grace calls, they are in each other's arms. Grace is angry and gives Chester back his ring. He gives it to Pearl. Grace goes around to the detective office to complain about Pearl, and Pearl, who is there resigning, submits her bill, which is $200. Chester, meanwhile, has discovered Pearl's real identity by finding her notebook, but when she confesses his heart goes out to her and all is well.

An ideal comedy, with some exceptionally clever work by Miss Pearl White and the rest of the cast.

On the same reel:

OH! WHISKERS.—Mr. Baldwin was the possessor of an unusual pair of side-whiskers. He was very proud of them. He calls on Miss Hegg and presents her with his photo. She is very fond of him. His next call is on Miss Lucy Pining, a friend of Miss Hegg's, and he also gives her a photo of himself and his glowing face adornments. He cannot make up his mind which old young lady he likes better. On general principles he strolls into a barber shop to get spruced up. The barber, a Frenchman, misunderstands Baldwin's order, but Baldwin, who has fallen asleep, is not aware of the fact until he is awakened by a frightful pulling on his face, and then he sees that the unknowing barber had cut off one of his whiskers. There is nothing left for him but to have the other one cut also. He rows with the barber and gets kicked out. He goes out on the street and meets Miss Hegg. He accosts her but she runs away from him, not knowing him. He then runs across Miss Pining and attempts to speak to her, but she does the same as Miss Hegg. The two ladies meet a policeman and tell him of the strange man. Just then Baldwin comes up and they point him out to the cop and he chases him through the streets. The ladies go to Miss Hegg's house. Baldwin had sought refuge in her garden and climbed through the window. The ladies see him and beat him up with their fists and sofa pillows until Baldwin is all in. He at last gets them to understand and he exits, vowing never to see them again, at the same time bemoaning the loss of his beautiful whiskers.

Jack overhears the conversation and applies for the job, which old Joe gives him. Jim is angry and tries to prevent Jack from entering the boat. Jack knocks him down and leaves him on the sand threatening vengeance.

Jack and Joe return and Joe points out a boarding house where Jack can stay. He engages a room and starts to go upstairs but is tripped up by a drunken sailor. A fight commences, while Jim, who has planned it, looks on.

Meanwhile Jack has fallen in love with Peggy, but she does not approve of his quarrelsome ways, although she likes him. One day he is walking along the cliffs and falls over. He is seriously hurt and is carried to the cottage where Peggy and her father live. She nurses him back to health and gradually gets to care for him.

Tony knows no English and has difficulty in obtaining work. He gets a job on a road gang and hastens home each night to his little Rosa, whom he loves passionately. One day he sees a pretty flower and picks it and the child is so pleased with it that another evening he picks another and is pounced upon by the irate owner of the garden. He is taken to the station and is unable to make them understand that he did not know he was doing anything wrong.

Eventually, he is brought to the night court, but all he can say is "I no steal'a da flower. I pick it for leetle Rosa." The judge, noting the genuineness of the man's efforts at explanation, sends him with two policemen to investigate the truth of his story.

In the meantime Rosa has made the tea and has set the lamp in the window, but her daddy does not come home, so she sets out to find him. She comes to the street excavation and falls in and is rescued by the watchman, who soothes her and carries her home. They arrive as Tony, crazy at her loss, is fighting desperately with the policemen to get away and hunt for her. The passionate warmth of the reunited Italian and the child convince the policemen and they overlook their minor injuries and leave them together.

Their entire conversation is heard by the owner, the cub is dragged from the fire-escape where he has been concealed, a terrible fight ensues, the police are called in and the managing editor and his crooked friends are taken into custody. NESTOR

THE INGRATE (May 2).—Bill and Bess are engaged, but as Bill drinks heavily, the girl's brother, John, and his wife, together with Bess' father, disapprove of the engagement. John is going to the gold country to further work his claim and Bill asks to go. John is persuaded by his wife to agree after she hears that Bill has promised to stop drinking. They go; months pass and nothing is heard of them. Finally they start back, but their pack mule gets away as they are passing through the desert. John goes after him, and while he is gone Bill leaves the camp with the gold. He is unable, however, to find the canteen of water, the only one left, as John has carefully hidden it. John returns, finds the gold and Bill gone and starts to search for him. After a couple of days the mule returns home and the father obtains a horse from a friend and starts out in search of the boys. He finds John, water gone, but still alive. They revive him and then hasten on for Bill, but death has claimed him and in his hand is a notebook which reads, "May God forgive me for what I have done." On the following page is written, "Tell Bess my last thoughts were of her. Bill." Taking the gold they start back, but instead of showing Bess the entire note, he merely hands her the second page.

SOLAX

A SEVERE TEST (April 25).—Daisy Jones had been married just a year when her husband failed to kiss her one morning, and she decided that he did not love her any more. She decided to test him. She wrote a note to her friend Ella, telling her that she was going to leave her husband a note telling him that she had jumped into the lake. She would leave some of her clothes on the pier to make it look more plausible and she and Ella would hide themselves nearby and see how he took it.

Then she wrote a note to her husband telling him that she had jumped into the lake. She got the notes in the wrong envelopes.

Ella's went to her husband and vice versa. Ella was horrified and rushed to the husband's office, where she learned the truth. The husband told Ella to carry out the plan and he would teach her a lesson she would not soon forget.

Daisy took a suit case with some clothes in it to the pier. Ella met her. They placed the clothes on the pier. The husband came down, looked at the clothes, acted horrified for a moment, then kicked the clothes, stuck his thumbs into his vest and walked away whistling a tune. Daisy saw him and cried bitterly; then became indignant. She went home with Ella.

Jones decides to carry the joke further. He went to his printer friend and had him make out a wedding invitation announcing the coming marriage of Frank Jones to Isabelle Smith, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas C. Smith, choosing the name at random.

By a mistake in the composing room it got into the paper. Jones was frantic. So was Mrs. Jones. Jones looked into the directory to see if anyone by the name lived in the city. Sure enough, there it was: Smith, Thomas C., Mrs. Smith, and Isabelle. Jones rushed to the Smiths to apologize. Daisy rushed to the Smiths to punish Isabelle.

Isabelle happened to be Smith's cook, and she was a big negress. She greeted Mrs. Smith with a rolling pin, and when Mrs. Jones saw her she sank into a chair. Jones, in the meantime, was on his knees begging Mr. and Mrs. Smith to forgive him. They were elderly people and a little deaf, but they understood that Jones wanted to see Isabelle. They showed him to her room. The negress turned on Jones. Daisy was aroused and protected him—then turned on Jones to give him a good, round scolding, when he pulled the note meant for Ella from his pocket, and his wife wept and pleaded for forgiveness. They made up and Daisy learned that Frank still loved her.

WHEN JIM RETURNED (April 24).—Jim had been away a long time. Pretty Marjie dressed herself in her very best, when she heard that the boys had gone to the station to bring home the college chap. Jim arrived, climbed into a ranch outfit and felt at home once more. The boys decided to give him a party. This was the inspiration of Chick, who confided it to his sweetheart, Polly. And Polly hurried off to Marjie, who in turn designed a little affair of her own. All would have gone well if Jim, in his exuberant spirits, had not kissed Polly when Chick chanced to be around. Chick objected and started to queer the party. The result was that Chick was lassoed, thrown in a corral with a vicious ram, with dire result to himself and extravagant amusement to the others.

CALAMITY ANNE'S TRUST (April 26).—Calamity hauled her burro through a stream just in time to see Sand-Eyed O'Brien put a pistol to his head, but too late to save him. Result—a will was found in which Calamity was asked to take charge of O'Brien's pretty daughter. Calamity did, lavishing all the love of her big heart on the orphan child.

Calamity's particular forte in life thereafter was to protect her ward again cowpunchers. She wanted that ward to to marry a "Dook" or prince, or somebody that Calamity had vaguely heard about. Hence, when handsome John Wengle made advances, Calamity started for him with her six-shooter. In fact, every time that Calamity went abroad she had occasion to use that six-shooter, for all the boys were hard after that ward.

One day came a daintily-dressed snappy-looking little chap, arrayed in the city's latest. What the cowboys did to him was a scream, until Calamity interfered and dispersed them. And Calamity had an idea—why not marry her ward to this evidently prosperous youth. She tried—love blossomed without effort, but the young couple, unaware of Calamity's desires, were too much afraid of her. So they rushed off to a neighboring town and had the job done.

Meanwhile the stage stopped and an elderly, well-dressed gentleman from the city alighted. The half-dozen cowboys eyed him curiously, and when he carelessly threw his suitcase toward them to carry, they let it drop and stared at him. Calamity and he met—met, when he found Calamity fast asleep in a doorway with a note announcing the elopement in her hands. Thus papa quickly learned what had happened to his angel boy, and roused Calamity roughly. This almost cost him his life, but after explanations, Calamity took a strong likening toward the city man. After a bit the wayward couple returned and all was rejoicing in Calamity's hut, but all was sorrow in the corral.

WHEN THE RIGHT MAN COMES ALONG (April 28).—Anyone seeing the handsome suite of offices on Wall Street would think the owner, J. Green, was one of the Napoleons unchanged, but they would not think that this same J. Green was a woman so thoroughly immersed in the intricacies of the Bulls and Bears of the exchange that all their considerations were forgotten.

Her people happily married and scattered to the four winds, wrote insistent but vain letters to her to abandon money grabbing and enjoy the felicity of normal married life. These letters she treated with contemptuous indifference. No man interested her until Arthur Roydon was brought directly under her notice.

During business hours she finds her mind straying to him, and when he enters her office one day, the warm springtide of love fills her heart. He is all business, cold and aloof, places a check in her hands for stock investment and leaves abruptly. She resolves to win him, but though their meetings at the club are frequent, he remains unchanged. Spurned and lonely, she returns to her apartment late one night, and, after the expiration of many hours and the consummation of many cigarettes and brandies and sodas, she solves the question. She is too mannish. A 'phone message to a woman outfitter's, a change of clothes and manners, and Arthur Roydon falls completely under the feminine charms of J. Green, his Julia.

THE ORPHAN (April 29).—John, the black-faced sheep of the Hallet family, is ill in a Western mining town, and, finding that he is about to die, writes to his younger brother, Will, asking him to take care of his little motherless girl. Before he can finish and mail the letter the cold hand of death stills his heart, and he is found dead in his cabin by a miner friend. The miner reads the letter and takes it with the child, back East to Will Hallet, who is a young bachelor and society man, engaged to a wealthy and beautiful girl, Betty O'Moore.

Will's first impulse is to refuse the bequest, but the winsome little three-year-old tot, with her golden curls, worms herself into his affections at first sight, and he decides to keep her.

An incident in the park the next day shows him that Betty, his fiancee, does not care for children, and he puts off telling her of his little charge.

The baby proves a trial as well as a delight to Will as she is the cause of his breaking an engagement with Betty for the opera, then another for a luncheon, which so angers Betty that she gathers his numerous presents together to return to him.

The little Rose is suddenly taken ill and Will telephones an employment agency for a nurse who, when she finds the patient is a child, refuses to stay. Will, in desperation, leaves the house to find a nurse, and, during his absence, Betty, who has decided to return his presents in person, arrives at his rooms, and, finding the sick baby, realizes that here is the innocent cause of her lover's apparent remissness as to his engagements.

The real woman heart of her is awakened by the sweet helplessness of the little one, and she gathers her into her arms and comforts her in the way that only a woman can do, and thus Will finds them upon his return.

He sees the presents on the table and Betty's engagement ring at the top of the heap, but as she takes this from him and coyly replaces it on her finger, he realizes that his little orphan ward has now found a mother as well as a father.

This story is beautifully photographed and acted and is full of the gripping heart-interest which goes so far toward making a successful picture.

GRANNY (April 29).—During a rehearsal of his new play, Peter Richards, a playwright, recognizes in Mary Walters, a well-known leading woman of twenty years before. She has met with reverses and is now employed as wardrobe woman in the company which is to produce his play. On the opening night, the new play is a complete failure, and the manager who financed it, decides to take it off immediately. Mary Walters is the only one in the theatre who has feeling enough to show sympathy for the author in his misfortune. Through a chance remark of an extra girl Peters gets an idea for another play, which he writes and calls "Granny," and he has enough confidence in Mary Walter's ability to offer her the leading part, which she gratefully accepts. Confident of its success. Peter's ambition is to produce "Granny" at the same theatre where his former play met with such complete failure, but the manager refuses to produce it and Peter is forced to sell his home in order to secure enough money to put the play on. During his days of trouble Peter sees the sterling worth of Mary, and as he walks with her to the theatre on the opening night, they pass a quaint little church, and Peter asks her to share the future with him, no matter what the night may bring to them. Mary consents and they enter the rectory and are quietly married, after which they go to the theatre for the opening performance. Peter's judgment is vindicated, and the play is an unqualified hit. At midnight, Peter escorts Mary to a private room in a restaurant, and, as they begin their supper, the orchestra in the main dining-room plays softly. Peter salutes his wife with old-fashioned chivalry, and says:

"And the night shall be filled with music,
And the cares that infest the day
Shall fold their tents like the Arabs,
And as silently steal away."

THE SILVER CROSS.—John Smith leaves the little country town in which he was born and comes to New York, the "City of Opportunity," to earn enough money to keep his old parents from becoming dependent upon the charity of neighbors. Before leaving home his old mother gives him a silver cross to wear as a keepsake.

Ten years have passed since John Smith left that little village to make his way in the world. He has been successful and has forgotten his aged parents, who looked to him for support in their declining years. He is host at a banquet given to his friends at his own palatial home. As his guests depart, the orchestra plays "Home, Sweet Home." The strains of this familiar melody touch his conscience. He decides to return unannounced to the old homestead. He comes to the cottage. When he sees that his own parents do not recognize him, he decides not to reveal his identity until the morning. He tells the old couple he is a traveler in search of a night's lodging. Congratulating themselves on the opportunity of making a few cents, they bid him enter. He eats the scanty supper prepared for him, and thinking that perhaps the old couple might be in immediate need for money, he pays for the supper in advance, from his well-filled wallet. The old man, watching him narrowly, is very much impressed with the stranger's display of wealth. He thinks over his own poverty-stricken condition and decides to steal the stranger's money. When the stranger is not looking the old man drops a sleeping powder in his coffee. The old man enters the room, candle in one hand, hunting knife in the other, to kill the sleeping traveler. At this moment he is interrupted by the old mother, who, intuitively feels something is wrong, and tries to shield the stranger. Her hand touches his bosom and the silver cross.

A HOUSE DIVIDED.—A whole year married and not a quarrel! Gerald Hutton goes to his office where a salesman spills cologne on his coat. Diana helps Maggie clean house. The milkman forgets his gloves. Rough gloves and delicate perfume—a combination begetting trouble. It arrives. Gerald and Diana agree to live separately together. There is no divorce, but Diana and Gerald will never speak to each other again. If Gerald wants his clean pajamas he uses Maggie for a telephone. If Diana expects company she writes Gerald a note. And they live like this for a week. Obadiah Wilson, the family lawyer, draws up the papers.

Neither will give in. Gerald finds office work a curse without somebody to work for. Luckily, the perfume salesman comes in. He is quicker in going out. Then a message arrives from Diana. They had forgotten the wedding anniversary and mother and other guests were coming. And it was Maggie's day out. And somebody would have to bring home canned lobster and sugar. Gerald closes the office and hurries home. Diana's mother arrives. Of course she discovers the insurrection. In five minutes she has heard both sides of the story. Mother decides to remain impartial. Other guests arrive and Gerald and Diana have a hard time keeping the scandal to themselves and mother and Obadiah. It is easier when the men go off to have a rubber of whist. Suddenly Diana hears a noise in the cellar. Burglars!

Without alarming the guests she hands Gerald a note informing him of the catastrophe, and Gerald hurries downstairs. He is brave, especially with Diana behind him. Diana gets him the revolver from the sideboard, and they wait in the kitchen for the burglar to come upstairs. The door opens. Maggie has forgotten her key and dropped in through the cellar window. Scared stiff at the revolver, she scrambles upstairs. Gerald and Diana look at each other. Gerald recollects the quarrel, frowns, and enters the dining-room to throw the milkman's gloves out of the window. Diana follows him to beg for a reconciliation. Instead it is Gerald who "backs down." And they had a real wedding anniversary after all.

TOLD IN CONFIDENCE (April 26).—Dr. Miller and his family, consisting of his wife, a little daughter and his mother, live happily in their own home and have in their employ a faithful butler and a serving maid. Mrs. Jones, a middle-aged busybody and gossip, occupies apartments in an adjoining house, which gives her a view of the Miller dining-room. During the family repast Dr. Miller chides the maid and butler for spilling gravy on one of the napkins, and plainly shows his annoyance. Thereupon Mrs. Jones hurries over to Mrs. Brown and tells in confidence that the doctor has upset furniture and is about to chastise the entire family. The doctor is pictured as a brute, pure and simple, and both Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Brown are horrified. The latter loses no time in rushing off to Mrs. Smith, and by the time she arrives, she has enlarged upon the original story to such an extent that Mrs. Smith is led to believe that the disturbance in the doctor's family was caused by the fact that the latter's wife was caught making love to the butler, and then it was that Dr. Miller became furious and tried to murder everyone in the house. His little child, she is told, was most violently handled, and his wife was tossed about like a rag doll. No sooner had Mrs. Brown departed than Mrs. Smith donned her hat and cloak and hurried to another nearby neighbor, to whom she imparted the information that the infuriated Mr. Brown had thrown the butler out of the window, and while the unfortunate man was clinging to the ledge, he was shot by the doctor. And so the story spread and became enlarged upon until a large crowd assembled in front of the doctor's home. Imagine the surprise of the curious ones when Dr. Miller and his family appear at the portal in a merry group preparatory to taking a drive. The three gossips slink away amid the jeers of their neighbors. The incident of the napkin and the stories told by the women are depicted in the unfolding of the story.

THE HELPING HAND.—Jack Burns, an ex-convict, finds it difficult to secure work and seeks aid from a wealthy minister, who believes Jack's story and engages him as a chauffeur.

Bert, the minister's son, becomes infatuated with a designing woman, who, with several notorious gamblers, inveigle him into gambling. He loses in a card game and is forced to give an "I. O. U." for $800. Jack Burns sees his benefactor's son with one of the gamblers, whom he recognizes, and warns Bert, but Bert resents his interference. Not having money to pay his gambling debt, Bert is cast aside by the woman and threatened by the gamblers, fearing that they will carry out their threat to inform his father of his conduct.

In order to pay the $800, Bert attempts to take the church donations left in his father's care. He is surprised in his act by the ex-convict, who forces the money from him. The minister discovers the loss of the money before Jack is able to return it. Jack is accused of the theft and is dismissed. The minister later learns that his son is the real culprit, and, through the ex-convict's persuasion, he forgives his son.

Later the ex-convict is exonerated from the crime for which he served a sentence of five years.

THE HYPNOTIC COLLECTOR (April 24).—Willie Dunn is out of work, and broke. He is about to be evicted from his furnished room. He is love with a beautiful girl, who in turn loves him. The girl's father, however, violently dislikes Willie. Willie sees an advertisement for a collector, answers it, and secures the position. Then, his troubles begin! He goes to collect a bill from a society woman and is unmercifully snubbed by her. When Mrs. Hooligan, who is not a society woman, won't pay, he attempts to take her pig, but Mr. Hooligan appears and does a few things to poor Willie Dunn that leaves him rather the worse for wear. His adventures with the tough saloonkeeper, the physical culture instructor and the liveryman are very funny to the observer, but not to Willie. He and his clothes are badly battered when at the end of the day he returns to his employer with no collections. He gets no sympathy, but is told he must see the same people the next day, and if he doesn't get any money he loses his job! Disconsolate, he wanders the streets, and with his last dime buys a copy of "Conquer by Hypnotism" from a faker. He learns the art over night, and starts out in the morning with new courage. Hypnotism delivers the goods! He makes the debtors go through all kinds of funny antics, and finally marches the whole crowd to his employer's office, where he makes them pay up. Then he hypnotizes his employer into signing a contract engaging Willie for five years at $5000 a year. His final and greatest victory is when he forces his sweetheart's father to consent to the marriage.

COL. (BUFFALO) JONES

Col. (Buffalo) Jones has contracted to lecture for the Klaw & Erlanger Company, illustrating his talk with his famous pictures of roping wild animals in Africa. The Colonel opens at the Garrick Theatre, Philadelphia, on Monday, April 14th.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The initial appearance of the Edison talking pictures in the capital of the nation marked an epoch in filmdom here. They are booked as a feature at Chase's Theatre, Washington's newest and handsomest playhouse, the home of polite vaudeville. With a seating capacity of 2,000, this theatre held a record of 10,000 patrons during the first three days of the advent of the talking pictures, and a goodly part of the audience of each show of one hour and a half remained for two performances to fully appreciate the new sensation of the latest Edison invention. They are wonderful and seem almost unreal on first hearing. The sound production with motion is fascinating and has already gripped the photoplay fan. The talking pictures shown for the first week at Chase's were "A Descriptive Lecture" and "The Edison Minstrels." The next offerings were "The Quarrel Scene" from Julius Caesar and "The Temptation of Faust," which were even more wonderful.

It means progress to the moving picture industry when a grand theatre like Chase's turns to exclusive motion pictures for its summer season with a general admission of 10 cents from 1 o'clock to 11. Each show includes several kinemacolors, two talking pictures and several black and white reels, with a change of bill daily except with the kinetophones.

In speaking to Miss DeWitt, manager of Chase's, on this innovation she said, "We have been using the kinemacolors and one black and white reel as a part of our regular vaudeville show for some time, but when we contemplated having a summer season of pictures exclusively, I made a serious study of the field and its possibilities. Desirous of offering something different, we secured the rights for the talking pictures, which we have surrounded with the best in kinemacolors and black-and-whites. I spent weeks of travel in various cities studying what the public liked, how these houses were conducted, and what the studios were doing. I am not a picture fan and consequently this inspection tour was rather a business than a pleasure. It contained surprises and revelations to me here and there, especially in the tasty decoration and refinement in many of these small picture houses.

"Despite my long managerial career in the vaudeville field, I realized that there were many things yet to learn in the field of cinematography. The talking pictures have certainly captured the public. They were paid the highest compliment at the first show, when they were greeted by a spellbound, silent audience of more than two thousand people, who remained in their seats until the pictures came on the screen again, and then they burst into a deafening applause.

RICHARD GOODALL

A very pretty birthday anniversary dinner was tendered Richard Goodall Tuesday, April 15th., at his home. He was the recipient of many presents and messages of good cheer from here and abroad, from his many friends. He has severed his connection with the Universal Film Company, 1600 Broadway, and is going into a moving picture project, and will startle a few of the "wise ones" with some of his original ideas, that fit him like a glove for his new enterprise, having handled 300 to 400 people people at different times in Pantomime abroad. He is a well-known newspaper man, also a cartoonist of national fame, which all goes to show his versatility, and one may look for big results from his efforts.

With Mr. Goodall is Franklin B. Coates, both in a business capacity and on the screen. Mr. Coates will act as leading man in all Mr. Goodall's productions, and is in all probability the best qualified man obtainable.

The above gentleman has several business ideas, educational, romantic and novel, that will stand before the camera, as his physical and muscular developments undoubtedly are unsurpassed.

AN INTERESTING CONTRACT

The recent contract between the New York Motion Picture Company and the Mutual Film Corporation, and which is to go into effect July 1st, stipulates that the Kay-Bee, Broncho and Keystone, which are all New York Motion Picture Company brands, remain on the Mutual programmes, so long as the agreement lasts.

It has also been decided that the New York Motion Picture Company shall release twelve instead of of the present six reels weekly, the extra ones to consist of three reels of drama, two of comedy, and the remaining one to be optional between drama and comedy.

'Tis also understood that new producing companies will be formed with studios in the vicinity of New York. After September 1st one extra reel will be added weekly until the requisite number of releases has been attained.

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH INSTALLATIONS

The R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company, of Boston, Mass., has installed in the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League headquarters in Boston one Power's No. 6A complete.

Power's Cameragraph No. 6A with motor and mechanical speed control has been approved for use in Houston, Texas.

Also the following installations have been made:

The new Bunny Theatre in Flatbush avenue near Sterling place, Brooklyn, two Power's Cameragraphs No. 6A with motor drive. The St. Clair Opera House at Greensburg, Pa., one No. 6A complete through the General Film Company, Pittsburgh; the Princess Theatre, Marlboro, Mass., one No. 6 complete with Dissolving View Stereopticon, through the N. E. Universal Film Exchange, Boston, St. Patrick's Church, Toronto, Ont.; one Power's Cameragraph No. 6A, through Charles Potter, of Toronto.

PROTECTED METAL COMPANY WINS

The United States District Court for the Southern District of New York has issued a temporary injunction restraining the H. W. Johns-Manville Company from the further manufacture and sale of metal roofing and siding material having the surfaces protected by asbestos in its fireproofing condition. The Asbestos Protected Metal Company has extensive manufactories at Beaver Falls, Penn. They are the originators of steel sheets protected by asbestos for building purposes and moving picture operators' booths.

SMITH'S OPERA HOUSE, GENEVA, N. Y., UNDER NEW MANAGEMENT

Mr. Jerome Cohen has taken charge of the above place, and through Mr. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," is installing a Simplex Projecting Machine with Hallberg A. C. Economizer. A Simplex Machine with Hallberg Economizer is also being installed at the new Clarendon Theatre, 1105 Flatbush Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., together with a full line of supplies purchased through J. H. Hallberg. This is a very fine up-to-date theatre, which will be run only with high-class pictures. Mr. Hallberg also reports the sale of two Powers No. 6A Machines complete for use in Panama.

NOTES

W. Stephen Bush, of the Moving Picture World, sailed on Saturday, April 12th, en route for Europe.

* * * *

J. Stuart Blackton of the Vitagraph sailed for Naples on March 29th, accompanied by Carle J. Brenner. They are expected to return about the end of May.

* * * *

A. N. Smith, also of the Vitagraph Company, returned to New York from Europe last week, via the S. S. Olympic.

* * * *

L. A. Woodward, vice-president and manager of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, owing to the decided increase in business of the Motiograph machine, has decided to stay over in New York another week.

Among the recent installations of the Motiograph Machine in the New York territory are two 1913 model machines with motor drive in the Colonial Theatre managed by Mr. Thomas Thomson of Stamford, Conn., one of the most up-to-date houses in that section of the country.

London, it is said, is "Movie" mad. The moving picture interest is expected soon to involve some of the largest metropolitan theatres. Hammerstein's Opera House has already been converted into a moving picture palace.

* * * *

Is it true that a Los Angeles motion picture director recently had a horse tied so that it could not move its limbs, placed a saddle upon it and rolled it down a 60 per cent. grade over stones and stumps, a depth of 200 feet, just to add to the realism of a picture?

If this be true, which company was it whose director is in the habit of resorting to such cruel methods for obtaining thrills?

* * * *

A move is on foot for the instituting of film lessons in the London Public Schools. It has been proposed to exhibit a series of educational films in the halls of six polytechnics, 1,000 children to be present at each exhibition.

* * * *

In a conversation with C. Lang Cobb, Jr., manager of sales and publicity of the Ramo, he says that the statement and advertisement of the Exclusive Supply Company to the effect that the Ramo films are being released in their exclusive programme, is without foundation. He further states that Ramo films are now being sold to the various mutual and film supply exchanges, in fact, they will not tie themselves up with any faction exclusively until the film supply ceases to exist. All orders filled direct.

Miss Adele Lane, a very popular actress who has been playing leads with Lubin in Philadelphia, has joined the Selig Pacific Coast forces. She opened in the principal part of an exciting American-Mexican romance, impersonating a passionate Spanish girl in love with an American army officer, played by Harold Lockwood. The picture was put on in a big, bold way by Director Martin. The battle scenes are very vivid. Director Martin was right-hand man for "Buffalo Bill" Cody for years, and knows what a battle in the desert country really is, as well as what it should look like in a "show." The photoplay is entitled "The Flight of Princess Irma."

The fact that Judge Ben B. Lindsey, renowned as the friend of the children, has posed in a film called "Saved by the Juvenile Court" for the Columbine Films Co., seems to have caused no small commotion in the Cheyenne Feature Film Co. The offense, according to the plaintiff, is based on the fact that Judge Lindsey in so doing violated a contract made with the Cheyenne Feature Film Co. to pose in connection with juvenile court work for none other than the Cheyenne.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC., LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 619
Office—133 Third Avenue.

In last week's Chat I stated that I was so well pleased to inform my readers of the friendly feeling existing between the few members of the new branch of Local No. 35, I. A. T. S. E., and members of the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1. The latter organization (Local No. 1) was the former auxiliary of Local No. 35, and owing to the so-called friendly feeling of the few in the new branch of the former mother local, I took occasion to ask the branch men a few questions. I asked if the new branch was so friendly toward the members of Local No. 1, why do they not join and settle the matter at once. Some of them said: "Well, we joined the new branch because we were afraid of our jobs, and might have lost them if we did not join."

To those operators who feared losing their jobs, I want to tell them that they should look up the history of the United States, which is really a union book, and in which they will read how this great union country of ours came into existence. They will learn how to get courage, and, like the greatest men in history, who were fearless for a union's cause, not only sacrificed positions, but their lives, that we who live this day shall have the benefit of their sacrifices.

Had the men who made up the armies in the days of 1776 or 1861, lost their courage and turned their backs to run away in fear, there would not exist this day the flag with its stars and stripes. The man who fears to assist his fellow men for a just cause, and a cause which is for his own benefit, is worse than a coward. There are five hundred members in the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, that do not lose their jobs because they are not members of the new branch of Local No. 35, nor do they fear that if they continue to he members of Local No. 1 for five years that they will not get representation for taxation. That is the reason they are fearless, because they get what they pay for, and when they were in the auxiliary, they did not get representation, but had to pay taxation. The positions held by members of Local No. 1 are solid so long as they give justice to their employers and keep to the laws of the union. No member of Local No. 35 or the new branch can move in on these jobs unless they offer to work under their own schedule.

The day is near at hand when jurisdiction over all spots, floods, picture machines, from the front of all theatres back to the curtain line will be given to the operators, and no M. P. M. O. charters will be granted to ANY stage local; also that all existing auxiliary charters will be given a direct charter, and the word "projecting" will be added to all M. P. M. O. charters.

Now, fellow operators, I do predict this, and it must come soon. I warn you while there is a chance, prepare yourselves for what is hound to come. The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, has come to stay and you have the last chance to get into this union for the small initiation fee of five dollars, which holds good for sixty days, after which time it will be raised to fifty dollars, as was legislated at the last meeting. You have no excuse to make in the future, and say you cannot afford to pay fifty dollars, when you have this chance to join now for five dollars.

You must also consider the sick benefit we are giving to our members that no other local gives you. If you are a single man you receive five dollars weekly sick benefit, or should you be married, you will receive seven dollars weekly including free doctor and medicine to all.

In the days of the old auxiliary I was sick for six weeks, had a doctor every day at my house, and my illness cost me more than one hundred dollars, and I lost my job. Had the old auxiliary given me the protection that Local No. 1 gives you at present, I would not have had that expense, and my job would have been secured. One of our members, William Strickler, who is employed at the Manhattan Theatre on Broadway, lately was confined to his bed with pneumonia, and his job was protected by the organization.

Brother Strickler is still working at the same job, and he is not worried like the few branch men who joined that department last August because they feared their jobs.

I wish to inform the branch men that our boys are aware of the facts; that they know the few in the new branch who would like to join Local No. 1, but feel backward. Don't be backward, it is no disgrace to correct your mistakes, and understand, we have no special list called a "Black Ball List." We do object to one individual whom many of the branch men personally had denounced in my presence, but don't believe that the dog follows the tail, for you have already learned that the tail follows the dog. Don't be a tailender, but fall in line now, and remember, no man was always perfect in his undertakings. You know you were led to believe that a coal mine was a gold mine, and you found out different. Local No. 1 has not moved their office, it is in the same old place as it always was, the same office when we were in the ex-auxiliary, only furnished a great deal better, and anyone wishing to see me regarding the business of the union can find me there every day in the week from 9 a.m. to 12 noon. Our office is open for applicants from 9:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Brother John Richards is assistant business representative, and he will be pleased to give all operators any information desired.

Don't forget that you will have to pay fifty dollars very soon if you don't grab the opportunity at present and join while it costs but five dollars.

RALPH J. KNASTER,
Business Representative.

NOTICE.—We have only one office, 133 Third avenue, near Fourteenth street. City telephone Stuyvesant 619.

KALEM ENJOINED

Judge Ward, in the U. S. District Court, granted the General Film Company an injunction April 17th, restraining the Kalem Company from leasing a set of films to the Kinetograph Company. The General Film Company had a contract with Kalem, giving exclusive right to the use of films.

The Kalem Company argued it could have made no such contract, because to have done so would have been to create a monopoly at a time when Attorney-General Wickersham was investigating the affairs of the so-called "film trust." To escape prosecution under the Sherman law it had promised the Attorney-General to sell its films to all exchanges.

Judge Ward, in his opinion, said the promises made to the Attorney-General could not in any way affect the rights of the plaintiffs under the contract.

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6A

THE MACHINE THAT WEARS WELL PRODUCES PERFECT PROJECTION.

Two important qualities in a moving picture machine are:

1—DURABILITY

All parts must be of the very best for the purpose—your machine is subject to hard usage, it must wear well, it has got to back you up.

"On the 22nd day of April, 1911, we installed Power's Cameragraph. It has run for over 2,000 hours without one cent cost for repairs. What can an operator want with any other machine when he can get this result with Power's?" Yours truly,
BEN ST. CLAIR, Palace Theatre, Martin, Tenn.

2—PERFECT PROJECTION

Without this you cannot please, pictures must be clear, without flicker.

"In the reproduction of the Paul J. Rainey African and Arctic pictures, perfect projection has been absolutely necessary.

"After carefully comparing the merits of Power's Cameragraph with other machines, The Jungle Film Co. decided on the Power's Cameragraph. We are using over 30 machines in our various shows, where they are giving entire satisfaction." Yours truly,
J. C. HEMMENT.

General Film Service is the magnet that draws the crowds

WHEN you were a kid you had a magnet. Every youngster had. You marvelled at the way objects of steel were attracted to it. You didn't worry much about the principle of the thing or attempt to analyze why they fairly jumped at the magnet. They did—and that was enough.

General Film Service is the magnet of the exhibiting business. It draws the crowds right in your door. The reason is easily explained; but here again you needn't worry. The continued popularity of General Film Service is dependent upon our maintaining its present high standard. And that standard will be maintained so long as motion pictures are exhibited. We put the stuff in our programs that insures the success of your show. About all you have to do is arrange for the service.

Just the other day an exhibitor in Kansas said: "We have tried out other services, but the General beats them all." His case is not unusual by any means. The staunchest friends General Film Service has to-day are exhibitors who first tried some other service, and, in some cases, several others! Why not investigate now?

We have printed a little booklet that we'd like you to have. It's a concise review of the things that stamp General Film Service as superior. The colored cover alone is worth the stamp it will cost you to get it. Mention the News when you write.

The Edison wins the crowd because it projects clear, flickerless pictures that don't tire the eyes and are a real pleasure to look at. There are no discouraging "Intermissions for repairs". EX-CATHEDRA

THE FLOOD VICTIMS

ON behalf of the exhibitors in the flood valleys, an appeal is being made for aid. At a period like this when so great a calamity befalls a certain district of the country the appeal becomes nation wide, and every man and woman who is able so to do immediately sends a contribution to the general fund. This is distributed in the best and most consistent advantage to all concerned, and, naturally, taken in a pro rata manner, those who ought to have large sums only receive small ones, and the small ones, to them, what appears to be a large sum.

The horror of the floods seem to have cast a gloom upon every reader of a newspaper, and when we saw the meagre pictures exhibited as lantern slides, as illustrations to the magazines, and as moving pictures, taken by the various companies, it was realizable at once that this was only an infinitesimally small point, none of the horrors being depicted.

The Hon. John J. Lentz in writing to me ten days ago from the midst of the flood district said in a portion of his letter—"The flood cannot be described in words, nor by photographs, when you think of one street in this city with fifty houses upon it one day, and only two left the next day, you get a much better impression of the awful calamity than can be gotten from any photographs showing a few dead horses, or an overturned house, or a pile of debris. Our American Insurance Union had 3,500 people exposed to the flood in the valleys of Muskingum, Scioto, and the Big Miami Rivers, including such cities as Zanesville, Marietta, Parkersburg, Piqua, Miamisburg, Middletown, and Hamilton, and yet we only lost two lives by drowning; but, of course, the property lost in the way of houses and furniture can hardly be estimated. Our individual members are sending in contributions from all over the country. We are doing all we can to make life worth living."

This brought to my mind's eye a very vivid description of what sufferings must be entailed upon the flood victims, more especially as I have friends who live in this territory, both private and those connected with Cinematography, and it is these latter that specially appeal to the readers of the News. It is impossible for them to get from the giant contributions anything adequate to their needs, and so I am writing this appeal to every reader to send as much as he possibly can to the fund that I am opening for the benefit of the exhibitors in the flood districts. I am giving in full a letter I received from the worthy President of the National Exhibitors League of America, and on another page will be found the appeal to which he refers in his letter:

Dear Saunders:

After an investigation of the flood conditions, a meeting was held in Dayton, Ohio, April 17th, and after viewing the destruction of the flood, it was decided to call for contributions through your valuable paper from those who are in sympathy with our members and the Motion Picture Industry.

Enclosed please find letter addressed to you by our executive committee. I hope you will give this matter your earnest support in assisting to secure funds for those whom I assure you, are worthy and needy.

The human mind cannot describe the horrors and devastation of the flood—piles upon piles of goods of every description in the streets; push-carts loaded with furnishing goods, jewelry, and drugs, standing in the streets; piece by piece being washed to discover what the article is; men and boys selling shirts and other wearing apparel on the street; clerks with boots and overalls on, disposing of articles to secure what little they can; churches wide open rugs and carpets rolled up; the first story of every building in town with plate glass broken, windows and doors nailed up with boards; people cleaning out their cellars; others pumping water; others shoveling mud out on to the street from their homes; valuable goods of all kinds soaked with water and covered with mud; houses undermined by the flood grounded; great piles of brick where the fire destroyed part of the town; refined, cultured women in the aristocratic part of the town, trying to clean up the debris and again establish their homes; working side by side with men—ladies who never knew what it meant to work before. In every direction you look, streets are literally lined with damaged goods and mud; the alleys blocked with everything and in every condition.

Our committee visited many picture theatres and heard the stories of the narrow escapes of the sufferers when the flood came; it came in waves, each wave being much deeper and higher than the first and growing in intensity; many had to run for their lives and all they had left was their clothing on their backs. With the exception of one or two motion picture houses in Dayton, all lost their pianos, chairs, rugs, decorations—in fact, everything was destroyed but the building itself, and in very many cases the picture house itself was destroyed, leaving the motion picture manager without a business and a home.

I will simply say that the trip just made through the flooded districts has left such a deep impression of sadness and sympathy for the sufferers that it is almost impossible to write you as I would like.

I hope and trust that our brother exhibitors and friends will contribute liberally enough to assist those who have gone through such an awful siege of flood and fire.

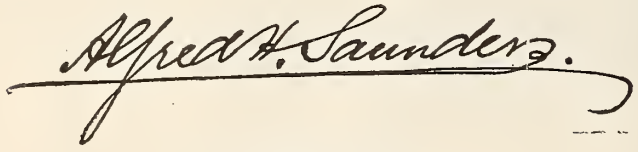
Very truly yours,

M. A. NEFF,

Pres. The M. P. E. L. of America.

It is desired that all contributions be in by Sunday, May 4th, so that the Committee can start work at once. In opening the columns of the News for this fund I want to make it distinctly plain that all contributions must be sent in check, draft, or money order, made payable to J. J. Reider, not to any persons connected with the News, or any other paper, but to the Treasurer of the League, J. J. Reider. No money is to be sent except in the above form. I have already subscribed largely to the flood sufferers and will do what I can also to help this fund by another personal contribution.

Now, then, Exhibitor! a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together; on behalf of your suffering confreres who have lost their all in the floods, and your names shall go down to posterity and the reward shall come to you by the consciousness that you have done what you could at the time of a great calamity when the cry of humanity went up for help and you responded. Many can help the one, but one cannot help the many, so send in as large a contribution as your means will allow, and the families in distress shall rise up and call you blessed.



THE SHADOW OF EVIL

For the many who have pasts to live down, the Itala feature film, "The Shadow of Evil," will hold interest. Many of us, although lacking some of the Seven Sins of Magdalen, are prone to have little or big pasts which we earnestly strive to keep strictly past and exclusively out of the present.

According to the laws of society, questionable in their equity, Woman has greater difficulties in getting rid of this past than has Man. How Mary escapes from a vile life with one man and later meets a real masculine and, after saving his life, marries him, is true to the stern and hard realities.

The situations in this film-drama are worthy of the master dramatist. It is a tense moment when the heroine, after having taken the name and position of a good woman and the nobility of legal motherhood, confronts her onetime sweetheart as he is in the act of robbing her husband's home.

Whether the mind of the sinister character is upset by this sudden meeting with a paramour of other days, or because of the grim justice which Nature is sometimes prone to dispense, the villain in crossing the railroad tracks, in his attempt to escape the hotly pursuing police, stumbles and falls. The time was not propitious for the falling of a mortal man across railroad rails as, just at this moment, a train comes round the curve ere the wretched man is able to regain his feet. Actors can be killed just like ordinary creatures, although their unlimited numbers in offices of Broadway managers tend to the belief that they are immortal and, like the Wandering Jew, are condemned to ever wander from booking office to booking office in search of the elusive job.

Graphically the photographic trickster manipulated this scene, as to the eye there is no apparent break. How this actor ever managed to get out from before this engine in time to keep hold on this life is wonderful. For those who delight in seeing villains come to sudden and violent ends, "The Shadow of Evil" is recommended. It is the acme of photographic dexterity.

Another scene in which the stagecraft rivals the finesse of David Belasco, is the wrecking of a ship off an angry coast. Expense has not been spared, and, judging by the number of passengers who have to swim for it in real sea-green water sufficiently deep to drown in, one might imagine that the Itala Company has called into play all of the natives of northern Italy. It is appalling to contemplate the cost of teaching all these players to swim, for they certainly have to swim.

Critics, to live up to their appellation "captious," must keep shy of exuberances of praise. In the instance of "The Shadow of Evil" the exception must prove the rule. It is masterly.

MR. GEORGE WILLIAM MIATT'S DAUGHTER MARRIED

The wedding of Miss Lillia Miatt, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George William Miatt of 431 Riverside Drive, and Russell Carter, of Amsterdam, N. Y., took place last evening at the home of the bride's parents. The Rev. Howard Duffield of the First Presbyterian Church officiated. Miss Dorothy Miatt was her sister's only attendant, and Asa C. Watson, of Brooklyn, acted as best man. The ceremony was witnessed only by the immediate families and intimate friends. A small reception followed. The floral decorations were very original and beautiful. Walter Wade furnished some excellent musical talent. The bride and groom departed after the reception and collation and the younger element danced and enjoyed themselves until a later hour.

Mr. Carter is Supervisor of Music for all the schools in the Amsterdam section and also organist of St. Ann's Episcopal Church of Amsterdam. Mr. Carter and his bride will be at home at 37 Market street, Amsterdam, after May 1.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

General Headquarters

703 Euclid Ave., Cleveland, Ohio

OFFICERS OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

President, M. A. Neff, 1003 Mercantile Library Bldg., Cincinnati, O.; Secretary, C. M. Christenson, 703 Euclid Ave., Cleveland, O.; Treasurer, J. J. Rieder, Jackson, Mich.; Counsellors, Hon. J. B. Foraker, Hon. J. J. Lentz; Executive Committee, M. A. Neff, Chairman; C. N. Christenson, Secretary; J. J. Rieder, L. F. Blumenthal, Geo. H. Wiley.

The Legislature of the State of Ohio adjourned Saturday. In all the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League defeated six obnoxious bills and passed the Censor bill.

One of the bills defeated was the closing of motion picture theatres in Ohio on Sunday. The Censor bill, as originally drawn by Mr. Neff, was offered in the House by Representative Snyder; it was referred to the House Judiciary Committee, who reported it out after several amendments were made.

While Mr. Neff was in Washington on Friday, April 11th, the bill was passed by the House, went to the Senate, was read and referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. After being considered in the Committee on Tuesday morning, the bill was indefinitely laid on the table, with the exception of one vote. Up to this time, Mr. Neff, who drew the original bill, could not possibly get hearing before the committees, and the boast was being freely made that all of the municipalities in the State of Ohio would have easy sailing and would have municipal censor boards in all the municipalities; however, it was soon discovered that they reckoned incorrectly. Mr. Neff managed to receive a hearing before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate on Tuesday night and after an extended explanation and a strong, earnest appeal to the senators in behalf of the uplift and the progress of the motion picture business, the Censor bill was re-amended, which gave it more of the appearance of the original bill, and while it was an absolute impossibility to get everything in the new bill that was provided for in the old, the bill as a whole was satisfactory, because it provides that Ohio can co-operate with other states in forming a Censor Congress.

Through the influence and hard, earnest work of President Neff and the co-operation of Governor James M. Cox, the bill was reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate at 4:35 Wednesday afternoon. The bill had its first reading at 4:50; it was read the second time at 4:55, and was passed on the third reading by the following vote: Yeas, twenty-three; Nays, three; not voting, six.

The bill was immediately sent to the Legislature and was called up Wednesday evening at eight-thirty and was passed by an unanimous vote.

This is a record for the State of Ohio in passing a bill that was not considered an emergency. The bill had been indefinitely tabled Tuesday morning, voted out Tuesday night; passed the Senate Wednesday; concurred in Wednesday night, and is now up to the Governor for his signature, when it will become a law.

It has been discovered by close observation and attendance in the legislative bodies of Ohio that the legislators are honest, active, conscientious and intelligent, but their great lack of knowledge in regard to the motion picture business in general is astonishing to those who are familiar with the wants and requirements of the business.

Ohio motion picture exhibitors realize that there must of necessity be some of their number elected to represent them in both branches of the legislature and in the various councils of the cities, by reason of the fact that when questions are asked in regard to the motion picture business in the legislature, not one person is able to give the desired information or to make a correct statement or to refute a misapprehension. The facts are that every state and city in the Union should have representatives in the legislative bodies, not for the sole purpose of working in the interest of the motion picture business but for the purpose of intelligently and forcibly explaining to the legislative bodies the facts pertaining to the motion picture business, in order that justice may prevail instead of vicious, unjust laws being passed by legislators who know comparatively nothing about the business, but if they were told the truth would be only too pleased to assist the motion picture industry instead of passing arbitrary, unjust laws which work hardships and in many cases cause exhibitors to invest money which is not beneficial to anyone but only to please the whim of some fanatic or scheming, unfair politician.

Cincinnati local held a meeting in Parlor G at the Sinton Hotel, Friday, at 2 p. m., to consider a license bill. The Council has practically agreed to reduce the license of the motion picture exhibitors of Cincinnati one-third. Two years ago the license was reduced one-half; this gives an idea of the effective work Local Branch No. 2 is doing in Cincinnati.

Two, and not to exceed three, reels of pictures, in Cincinnati is considered a full show. Cincinnati has never run over three reels except when some temporary show was being given, and now there is none of them running over three reels.

Miss Florence Turner and her manager, Mr. Lawrence Trimble, called on Mr. Neff in his office in the Mercantile Library Building, Saturday, at 5 p. m., Mr. Neff accompanying them to the Cinton Hotel, where a beautiful dinner was served. Sunday evening, at the last show at Music Hall, Miss Turner was presented with a large bouquet of American Beauty roses by Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, every member wishing her a safe, profitable and pleasant journey to her home and business engagement in England. The bouquet was presented by A. C. Dingelstedt, president of Cincinnati local. It was one of the largest and most beautiful bouquets presented to any actress in recent years in Cincinnati.

Motion picture headquarters has had several visitors in the past week, some of the prominent visitors being: Mr. Rembusch, of Indiana, national vice-president; Mr. Orin Parker, of Kentucky; Mr. Clem Kerr, of Dayton; Mr. M. Sterm, of Columbus; Mr. Dittmeyer, of Louisville; Mr. J. H. Broomhall, of Hamilton, and several others.

NATIONAL APPEAL TO EXHIBITORS ON BEHALF OF THE EXHIBITION FLOOD VICTIMS

My Dear Sirs: After visiting many places and personally consulting with members of our League who have suffered from the floods—some of them losing not only their entire theatres but also their homes—it has been decided by the National Executive Committee to ask your co-operation in raising funds to assist the members of our league in re-establishing their business. If they are given assistance at the earliest possible date, it will not only encourage them but it will make it possible for them to reopen their theatres. While there has been, I am informed, ONE MILLION SIX HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS contributed to FLOOD SUFFERERS, up to date, however, it is only a small amount to be compared with what has been lost, and if pro-rated to each sufferer, it would not exceed One Hundred Dollars. This statement is made to give the public an idea of the magnitude of this great disaster. The societies who have charge of the large fund to be distributed are handling it very carefully, judiciously and effectively. The fund that we ask will be given directly to the members of our league, and a committee representing the Press and the members of our organization will distribute the money donated and the journals will print the name of each contributor.

The committee to distribute the funds will be announced in the next issue. The money should be contributed AT ONCE owing to the fact that we must act quickly to relieve our brother and help him to re-establish his business. We do not expect to build a theatre for those who have, but we expect to receive enough contributions to assist him whereby he may re-open his theatre, although it may be a year or two before he will have his theatre entirely paid for.

We call upon every member of our league to give as liberally as he can. The reason this call has been delayed is because it was the desire of the national officers to first investigate and BE SURE they were right before they went ahead, and now that the investigation has been made and there is a POSITIVE NEED for contribution, we appeal not only to our members but to everyone in connection with the Motion Picture Industry to contribute as liberally as possible. We assure all that every cent will be accounted for and an itemized statement made through the press to those who donated.

We have designated the MOVING PICTURE NEWS and THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, of the East, the BILL BOARD, of the Middle West, and MONTOGRAPHY, of the West, to accept contributions, which will be turned over to the proper committee appointed and announced in the next issue.

We ask all contributors to make checks or money orders payable to J. J. Rieder, Treasurer; however, we request contributions to be sent to The Moving Picture News.

Very truly yours,
EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

C. M. Christenson, Sec.

MARYLAND M. P. E. LEAGUE

The accompanying photograph is of J. Howard Bennett, proprietor of the New Pickwick Theatre, Baltimore, Md., vice-president of the State of Maryland; he has charge of all local matters pertaining to the big convention to be held in Baltimore, Md., at the Emerson Hotel on June 3d and 4th, 1913.

J. HOWARD BENNETT
National Vice-Pres., State of Maryland, M. P. E. League.

All arrangements have been completed and the committees are now hard at work to make the convention a grand success.

Maryland has been a little slow in coming into the league, but the rest of the states will find that Maryland will have a membership and representation that will be hard to keep up with on the part of the older states.

The convention at Wilmington, Del., which is to be held on Monday, May 26th, is progressing nicely and Mr. James N. Ginns, who is the national vice-president from Wilmington, Del., has charge of the convention arrangements in Wilmington. He is very busy sending out notices, etc.

A big convention is to be held on the 27th and 28th of May at Philadelphia, and the committee is working night and day. They are going to try to eclipse any state convention heretofore held. A meeting was held at the Continental Hotel and the following committees were elected: General Arrangement Committee: E. A. Jefferies, chairmittee: J. Weinreich, chairman; A. R. Cavanaugh, assistsecond vice-president; H. Hessar Walraven, secretary; George H. Roth, treasurer. Exhibit Committee: Walter Stuemfig, director of exhibits; John Greenbaum, assistant director; Walter Jacobs, press agent. Entertainment Committee—J. Weinreich, chairman; A. R. Cavanaugh, assistant chairman; John Smith, assistant chairman; Clem Kerr, general manager of convention arrangements.

Philadelphia exhibitors are enthusiastic and the big preparations being made will bring a large number to the convention.

Pittsburg Local No. 1 is getting ready to make a state campaign to secure new members in order to assist in making Philadelphia convention a record-breaker.

IOWA M. P. E. LEAGUE

A convention and exhibition of the Iowa branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, has been called for Des Moines, Iowa, at the Auditorium, Tuesday and Wednesday, May 13 and 14. This date has been changed from May 6 and May 7, owing to not being able to get the Auditorium on first dates. We extend a special invitation to exhibitors not members of the league, and we are going to make a special effort to interest them and show them the benefits to be derived through organization.

The expense is nothing compared to the benefits to be derived in the way of fighting adverse legislation and general uplift of the business. The defeat of the Burt bill for the regulation of moving picture films and establishing a state censor, shows the need of organization. If we hadn't been organized this bill would have gone through flying, like the Kansas censor law.

All members are requested to attend as there will be things coming up before the convention that will be of vital interest to every exhibitor.

Hoping that we may see all the exhibitors of the state present, and assuring you all a good time through entertainments planned,

We are respectfully,

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF IOWA.
FRED W. YOUNG, Secretary.

Manufacturers wishing space, kindly address secretary.

RAMO FILM COMPANY

The other morning, bright and early, we made a call at the studio of this company, situated at 102 West One Hundred and First street. After waiting round a while C. Lang Cobb, Jr., put in an appearance and showed us all over the plant, describing what they were doing and what they purported doing.

The excellence of the photography shown in two films exhibited to us is good. The theme, "A Helping Hand," is well chosen, and the result in the picture carries a very far-reaching moral. It is a sort of picture we like to see, one that carries its own story and will do an immense amount of good to cement the universal brotherhood feeling.

The second one, entitled "The Worth of Man," is an exceedingly good film, full of excellent possibilities, showing fully that to give assistance when needed, is always rewarded, and that when a man makes a supreme sacrifice, when he could have made money, does not always reap ingratitude from those whose cause he espoused. Ramo Films will make a market and a demand on their merits.

GOVERNOR SULZER SIGNS MOVING PICTURE BOOTH BILL

An important bill was signed by Governor Sulzer on April 18th, known as Assemblyman Wilmott's bill, which amends the general business law regarding the operation of moving picture apparatus by providing that booths approved by the proper authorities prior to the taking effect of this article shall be excepted from the provisions of Sections 209 and 210 and the measure further provides that a portable booth for temporary exhibitions may be used upon the approval of the proper authority and permits the use of concrete, brick, hollow tile or other approved fireproof material in the construction of booths.

Pauline Bush, that popular leading lady of the American Film Manufacturing Company, is again back at work after a long and serious illness in a Santa Barbara hospital. The charming personality of Miss Bush has been missed from "Flying A" pictures for some time and her many admirers will hear of her recovery with genuine pleasure.

COMMERCIAL MOTION PICTURE COMPANY

This company is on the same floor as is the Ramo Film Company, and paying a visit to one, naturally it was easy to run into the other, and in interviewing Eddie Roskam he was kind enough to exhibit the plant and explain the principles of their work. It is a perfect little plant and capable of doing good work.

One point of special interest was the water filter, which was very efficient in its working properties. The developing room was nicely fitted up with tanks, having a capacity of six frames supplied by Corcoran, who are well-known as being the best tank makers in the country. The perforating room was equipped with a Bell & Howell perforator. The printing room used the Hausman printers, and one principle of the exposing light attracted our attention. The illuminant is one of the most important items to secure good printing, and in this instance, a Nernst hand searchlight was used which gave a good degree of power for dense negatives, and for light negatives it was simply pushed back by rack work, thus giving an even degree of illumination and exposure. The finished product, of which we saw two, exhibited careful and good work. The plant is worthy the visit of anyone interested in the printing and developing of film.

Many young women have called up the American Film Manufacturing Company recently, asking for a Mr. Hart, who claims to be its manager. This party has evidently left business cards giving such misinformation in beauty parlors and other places where girls congregate. The Chicago police are after this man, who is evidently attempting to entice pretty girls into Texas, where, he claims, the American is operating a company. The American is, of course, in no way responsible for anything this party may do and issues this warning in the hope that it may prevent imposture.

JUST GOSSIP

By The Mahoney

To hear the name Fred Lennox (comedian, author, cartoonist, raconteur, and all round good-fellow) is to smile.

To meet him face to face, is to laugh.

And when he "cracks" one of his original "wheezes," is to howl.

The Mahoney has a scoop on Fred's latest story.

An attack of rheumatism caused him to seek the soothing influences of the waters of Mount Clemens, Mich. The daughter of the boniface with whom Fred sojourned, was musically inclined, and believed herself to be a great singer, so her indulgent parent humored her wish for an Italian singing master.

All day long the embryo Mlle. Pattinordicafarrar "solfeggio'd" through the halls. She "solfeggio'd," while supervising the making of the beds. She "solfeggio'd" when in the kitchen. And in truth it was "solfeggio" from early morning until the midnight hour, and then some. She criticized Nordica, Calve, Farrar, and told of their shortcomings. She thought Caruso and Scotti splendid, but all of the women were weak. Then she "solfeggio'd" again.

One day Fred, suffering from a particularly acute attack, groaned out.

"Who is your favorite tenor, Miss Foneskanes?"

To which she replied:

"Ben Hur" as she "solfeggio'd" into the pantry.

One of the most richly gowned women in attendance at the Screen Club ball was Florence Hackett (in private life Mrs. Arthur Johnson) of the Lubin contingent.

Mrs. Johnson has been prominently identified with the most important of her husband's productions for some time past.

* * * *

Ye gods!

A company has just been incorporated at Albany called "The Efficiency Bureau," to conduct a combined intelligence office for the employment of domestic servants of every description, with a department for the engagement of dramatic people. The directorate is composed of a number of persons with unpronounceable names. It will be a boon to the "artist," in these uncertain times of "try-outs" at Loew's Columbia and National theatres, to say nothing of the "breadline" at the various studios, for it will bring the "actor," the "cook" and the "waiter" into cohesion.

* * * *

A contemporary reports:

"Miss Maida Misteak, late of the Winter Garden, sailed for Europe on the Lusitania last Thursday."

Where, except Europe, could she sail for, on the Lusitania? Surely not Hunter's Point or Freeport, L. I.?

* * * * *

Mahoney Will Mandeville, whose very name exudes an atmosphere of aristocracy and culture, it is reported, now enjoys a permanency with the Ramo Company.

Will's many accomplishments are too well known to require comment, and Wray P. Physioc is to be congratulated on having secured the services of such a valuable adjunct to his already efficient staff of actors.

* * * *

My! My! What a strangle hold "commercialism" has taken in the ranks of so-called legitimate performers! Only a few years back the very mention of moving pictures excited derision and contempt in the minds of actors of the better class; now it is a fight to get into the game that only a short time ago was so universally despised by the "big guns."

Robert Drouet has succumbed to the creak of the "Kadeway" and joined The Mahoneys at the Lubin studio in Philadelphia. Mr. Drouet is an actor of distinction, who has long been recognized as one of the foremost leading men of this country, and his presence will lend additional strength to Sigmund Lubin's already brilliantly gifted aggregation of players.

Miss Daisy Evans, another member of Authur Johnson's Company, who attracted much attention at the Screen Club ball, is a refreshing example of modesty and ingenuousness. In these days, when publicity is so much the vogue, it is a novel experience, to meet with one who pleadingly begged:

"Please, Mr. Mahoney, don't print anything about me, I'm really not of sufficient importance."

In spite of Miss Evans' plea, The Mahoney takes the liberty of pronouncing her one of the most strikingly attractive of the many beautiful young women present.

Whisper!

We saw Lottie Briscoe seated in a box in close conference with J. V. Ritchey and Mildred Holland.

What does it portend?

Is Lottie coquetting with the Reliance or is the Reliance trying to ensnare Lottie. Or—was Mildred only recalling Lottie's triumphs as "Claude" in the "Two Little Vagrants." Time alone will tell.

* * * *

A story worthy of publication is going the rounds, and it is with pleasure The Mahoney is privileged to record it.

A certain studio whose liberality, generosity and foreseeing policy in its dealings with "actor folk," has been a matter of comment for some time past, recently fell into the hands of several bad advisory boards in the shape of sycophantic would-be persons, who, uncertain of their own positions, made an effort to solidify themselves with the powers by reducing the cost of the artistic end, in the employment of incompetent extra people for ensemble work.

The leading man, one of the best-known and most efficient of his kind, an ex-actor, who has never lost his head in spite of his well-deserved, honestly earned, world-wide popularity, stood it for quite a while, but finally rebelled.

Entering the studio one morning recently, he saw twenty or more people seated about, in various stages of make-up and dress.

"Who are these people?" he inquired.

"The extras for your picture," answered the badly-advised "reducer of expenses."

"Won't do!" emphatically declared the leading man. "Go get me actors!"

"But these extras only talk among themselves! And we get them for a dollar and a half a day!" persisted the badly-advised one.

"Don't give a damn!" said the leading man, "I want actors at five dollars a day. They give results and make more noise on the screen. Novices always whisper!"

And the twenty or more actors were immediately summoned.

THE SCREEN CLUB BALL

Of course I was there; you do not think I could miss such an occasion as this, especially when I am a Charter Member and paid the first $5.00, when I took a dare and then challenged the others to come on? So you see from the first my heart was fully in the Screen Club, and when the actors and actresses got together for a reel good time, I wanted to see how they reeled it off, and when I say that everybody was there that was anybody, it is saying a great deal.

There are one or two points that I specially noticed, though, and those are such as make me fully convinced that the American public do not know how to dance: the waltzes were bunny hugs, the schottisches were turkey trots, and the lancers were ditto. I went down on the floor to take part in the lancers and expected them to form the usual sets of eight, but bunny hugs, turkey trots, two step, one step, and no step at all, except treading on the insteps of lady partners of other dancers, and the conglomeration of the crowds trying to make some sort of motion, to an out-of-tune band, made things whirl a bit.

It brought to my mind the song that was very popular some years ago, "Oh, Listen to the Band," and I did. some of the instrumentalists were playing E sharp while the others were down in B flat. The herald certainly ought to take lessons on the trumpet, because he got all out of gear and dropped the notes where they ought to be high. It was a pity the Club did not get the 69th Regiment Armory or some other large place where one could get away from the crushed-in mass of humanity. However, taking it all in all, the ball was one magnificent success. It gave the greatest encouragement to all concerned, from office holders to floor men, and it would be a very individious distinction to mention anybody particularly, for the sole reason it is impossible to mention them all. Every manufacturer was represented, every actor or actress "who was anybody" was there. The manufacturers' office staffs were also in evidence. Leaving the manufacturers, we noticed that the Exhibitors' League had sent in a splendid delegation to represent them. The Operators' Union No. 1 was represented by all the prominent officers, thus showing a true fraternal spirit, linking together all the links of the industry.

One special item stands out with prominence, and should be mentioned, namely, the sale of an autographed souvenir program. An employee of one of the firms was very busy getting signatures of everybody present, after which the program was auctioned off by King Baggot. The bids commenced with $5, which was refused. After this $50 was offered, which was then raised to $100, jumping to $150, then $200. The next offer was $350, then came $500. Things began to get warm here, and it took a jump of $50. From this $550, matters got hotter and hotter until C. O. Bauman and Adam Kessel sprung it up to $1,000, at which price the program was knocked down to them, Ad. Kessel remarking, "I would have paid $5,000 for that program rather than let any of my competitors get hold of this book."

The event closed at sunrise, many of the members adjourning to the Screen Club rooms, where they finished up with a breakfast party.

Current estimates of the profits reach $7,500.

DOT FARLEY REJOINS FRONTIER FORCES

Mr. G. P. Hamilton, general manager of the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, has been in Albuquerque, N. M., for the past month, supervising the company now playing there under the capable direction of Harry Harvey. His presence there synchronized with the return to the Frontier brand of Miss Dot Farley, the beautiful and versatile young photoplay actress, who won her first substantial success before the screen, under the Hamilton auspices.

Miss Dot, whose christened name is Alma Birdilla Farley, has more recently been appearing before the camera on the Pacific Coast, where she was a co-star in comedies with Fred Mace, Ford Sterling, Laura Oakley and Mabel Normand. To join the forces at Albuquerque, she refused another very flattering offer from the Kinemacolor Company, who were extremely anxious to secure her services, because of her wealth of auburn hair and glorious brown eyes.

Miss Farley comes naturally by her histrionic talent, her mother, Mrs. Alma Farley, having been a grand opera singer with the Graus, Wilburs and Andersons. Dot made her first appearance on the stage in Chicago, at three years of age, and was featured by E. A. McDowell as Little Dot in "Wedding Bells." When six years old, she starred as Little Lord Fauntleroy, and was acknowledged the youngest child that ever essayed the part. Five years ago she entered the field of the silent drama, scoring her first big hit when she wrote "The Peril of the Plains," a three-reel feature, produced under the direction of Mr. Hamilton.

Miss Farley is the builder of dozens of successful scenarios, possessing a natural aptitude for judging the point of a story, and its applicability to the screen. She also sustains the reputation of being one of the most tastefully dressed women in the field of cinematography. She has a small fortune invested in wardrobe, comprising costumes covering every period, and for every occasion. Vivacious, talented, enjoying splendid health, and with a wonderfully magnetic screen presence, Miss Farley is assured a brilliant future in the motion picture art.

TONY SUDEKUM, OF CRESCENT AMUSEMENT CO., IS POPULAR IN NASHVILLE, TENN.

The Nashville Tennessean of Sunday, March 30, contained an interesting cartoon of Mr. Tony Sudekum, president of the Crescent Amusement Company, who operate motion picture houses in Nashville, Bowling Green, Clarksville, Knoxville, Columbia, Jackson and Hopkinsville, having in all a chain of twelve houses, which is going some. Mr. Sudekum, in addition to his manifold duties as president of the Crescent Company, is interested in the New Southern Milk Condensing Company and also the Union Ice Cream Company. Back in 1891 he used to deliver newspapers and everybody knew "Tony" and his faithful horse "Dixie."

INTERVIEW WITH I. W. CUNNINGHAM

National Director of the Greater New York Loyal Order of Moose

Following up my article in the issue of the 12th on the Hon. J. J. Lentz, I considered it a fitting opportunity to ask Mr. Cunningham for a few ideas in regard to the scope of the Order and the principal use to which pictures were going to be put and the part they were going to play in progression of the Order. As I mentioned in my article, the Reliance Film Company had received the order to take pictures of important events and also educational subjects, I therefore asked Mr. Cunningham to outline his ideas for the use of the pictures, which he did as follows:

It is the object of the Loyal Order of Moose to adopt something new in educational features at the Great Moose University they are building now at Moose Heart, Chicago, Ill. It has been in the past years for the boys and girls who went to school to sit at a book and study their geography. Around the world in eighty days has been accomplished. The Moose will take the boy or the girl around the world in eighty minutes by the motion picture. Instead of showing the boy or girl a picture of the River Nile, or the pyramids of Egypt, or any other part of the world in a book, particular special lessons in geography will be brought to the boy and the girl by the motion picture. In this manner also will be shown all other lines of educational work that can be demonstrated by motion pictures.

Motion pictures will also be made of the dedication of the Moose University, the Home of the Aged and Infirm, the Home of Orphans, and the General Health Sanitarium, next July, at which event all men of national prominence will be in attendance. From there the operators will go to Cincinnati to take a motion picture of the gigantic parade of our Silver Jubilee Convention, after which hundreds of reels of this picture will be made and distributed throughout the country to different National Directors in order that they may take them into large industrial plants where they may be shown at the noon hour to the men who are eligible to membership of the Order. It is the aim of the Organization Department to make the Loyal Order of Moose the largest fraternal order in the world, and our campaign for membership will be done with moving pictures. A. H. S.

The Santa Barbara studio of the American Film Manufacturing Company has recently purchased rights to some thirty well-known novels and dramas. They will be produced at once. In some instances the films will be released on the date the stories are published in the magazines.

EXPOSITION NOTES

At a meeting held at the executive offices by the Board of Directors of the First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, which will be held in conjunction with the Third Annual Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America at the New Grand Central Palace, July 7th to 12th, 1913, it was decided to offer a prize of $25.00 in gold for the best scenario to be used during the Exposition at the New Grand Central Palace (suitable for a man or a woman) and not to exceed more than five minutes in acting. It is said by Frank E. Samuels, secretary of the committee, that this competition is open to all and those scenarios not accepted will be immediately returned to their authors.

It is desired that these scenarios be of a comic nature and the author or authoress of the one accepted will be compensated to far greater extent than the prize mentioned.

Send all manuscripts to Frank E. Samuels, Secretary, Suite 207, German Bank Bldg., Fourth avenue and Fourteenth street.

At the Screen Club Ball last Saturday night the coming Exposition was the favorite topic of conversation.

Letters are coming from exhibitors from all over the country asking for further information about the Convention and Exposition.

Committeees have been appointed by President Trigger to take care of hotel accommodations, railroad time tables, etc.

Mr. W. A. Northam, general manager of a large circuit of theatres in England, is a visitor in New York and calls frequently to see Mr. Samuels, whom he met in London. Mr. Northam is greatly interested in our coming Exposition and says that although he cannot stay here until July he will surely return and that most of the manufacturers and exhibitors in England are planning to come over for the Exposition.

GENERAL FILM COMPANY AND KINETOGRAPH

The General Film Company has secured the assets of the Kinetograph Company, and has taken over all the business and from Monday, April 21st, on, the business of the two companies will be handled by the General Film Company. No official statement has been given out, but this notice will set at rest the minds of many readers of the News, who have been writing in for information regarding these two companies.

St. Cloud, Minn.—Manager Davidson announced that he will erect a theatre on the site occupied by the Davidson, which was destroyed by fire.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Environment

TO you, who write us so frequently that you are handicapped because you are not more fortunately situated, and do not live in New York, listen! Environment is self-atmosphere. It is the servant of every man and woman.

You can write good scripts where you are.

Environment is a personal affair. Men and women who form the habit of getting things done, of selling their literary output, make their own environment, hour by hour, day by day.

You can do something right where you are.

Environment is very cheap. It is easy to make. Bunyan, in jail, writing "Pilgrim's Progress"; Milton, blind, penning "Paradise Lost"; Stevenson, dying by inches, but writing classics—all masters of environment.

Writers worth while in this world make their own environment. And they make it so attractive that they draw human beings their way. You who write, whether in the village or in the city, keep your mind saturated with cheerful thoughts. Your environment is what you choose it to be. Add to your worth stature!

You can do good work right where you are, if you only try.

Hear Ye! Hear Ye!

On the evening of Saturday, June 28, in the Euclid Hotel, Cleveland, Messrs. A. W. Thomas, formerly of the Photoplay Magazine, and Ralph P. Stoddard, author and editor of the Cleveland Leader Photoplay Page, will be hosts to script writers of the Middle West. The dinner, we hear, is to be a thing of beauty and a joy forever. It will cost $2 a plate and reservations should be made by June 1. Address A. W. Thomas, 10,120 Adams, N. E., Cleveland; Ralph D. Stoddard, Cleveland Leader-News, or Paul J. Byrnes, Box 275, Cleveland, Ohio. They will send you full particulars. We have sent in an order for two seats so as to avoid the rush. There are going to be notables present. Giles R. Warren, A. H. Saunders, E. V. Brewster, C. B. Hoadley, Neil Y. Coward and others prominent in the moving picture field, we are informed, may be guests. Script writers in the Middle West are already packing their grips for the event. It is high time that the Middle West writers got together and discussed matters of interest. New York City is too far distant for many of them to journey, but Cleveland is just right. Messrs. Thomas and Stoddard wish it impressed that the banquet is no class affair and that every lady and gentleman interested in the script writing profession is cordially invited. Oh, yes, we nearly forgot to state that several well-known moving picture actors, who are also playwrights, have promised to drop in on the assembly.

Kindly Take Notice

Kindly do not send scripts for criticism or revision to the Editor of this Department. We have no time to attend to such matters. The Editor is not actively connected with any bureau of criticism or revision.

Soft For Lincoln J.

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company in its house organ states that Lincoln J. Carter has been paid $8,000 for sixteen scenarios. These include those sterling and sensational melodramas of "The Fast Mail," "The Heart of Chicago," "Under the Dome," etc., etc. The plays were in vogue about ten years ago. And the average script writer who submits new and appealing stuff must remain content with the ten, twenty and thirty "grabs." Oh Death, where is thy sting?

Human Nature

Have you a knowledge of human nature? It is essential in the gentle art of script writing. Have you a sense of humor? Have you mingled with people and noted their peculiarities and characteristics? You haven't? Then you had better begin. Ability, experience, the habit of observation and familiarity with the literary tools are prime requisites. One lady down in New Orleans tells us why she writes 'em: "There is the great desire, the persistency, and an idea—that's all there is to it."

What We Are Trying To Do

We are trying to teach the beginner; trying to smooth his pathway as best we can. We know the discouragements, the disappointments, the seemingly fruitless toil of literary work. For twenty years we have followed the game and have written everything from magazine "filler" to the book for a two-act operetta. Pictureplay writing looks easy, but it is not easy. Perseverance, natural ability, and constant visits to the picture theatre, for the purpose of study, will help. No one can teach you to write; the ability is God-given. All we can do is to try and help remove some obstacles. Are we succeeding?

Build Action

Don't write scripts, write action. Do not write action, build action. Cut out the fancy touches, the word paintings, and construct. Lead up logically to a big situation. Do not wander into the byways but hew to the line. And when you construct or build, build something. Start with a plan or a design and complete it artistically. In other words, be sure you have a plot or story to construct and not just a string of incidents. Here's a recipe: Plenty of original subject-matter. Well-known types to represent it. A seasoning of tenseness. Mix nicely and add an unexpected situation. Have something happen. Don't make it merely a thing. Let all simmer well and serve while hot.

Fiction Writers Active

Professional fiction writers are becoming very active in the script writing game, just as we predicted nearly a year ago. There are rumors of a Fiction Film Company in which noted authors and editors will be interested. Jack London and E. P. Oppenheim are writing stuff for an English film company, and other magazine workers are beginning to encounter success in this country. There is room for all.

Asks for Co-operation

The fire that visited the Western offices of the Universal on March 26th, destroyed a number of scripts, and all of the records of the Universal's Pacific Coast studios, according to a statement. Desiring to replace these insofar as it is in his power to do so, Richard Willis, manager of the Western Script Department, requests the cooperation of all writers who submitted scripts prior to March 26th. He says he will be glad to receive carbon copies of such scripts and promises to give same immediate attention.

Have You Carbons?

Have you carbon copies of scripts so that you can comply with the request of Editor Willis? The Western editorial offices of the Universal cannot be blamed with starting a blaze, and if you have no carbon copies of scripts submitted within the date designated—you lose. For many months we have been ding-donging at writers to carbon copy every script sent out. We wonder if there are any who fail to do so?

A Horrible Example

A well-known author submitted a script to an editor last August. He holds a statement bearing the editorial signature stating that the editor is holding that script for further consideration. The script was submitted following a widely advertised appeal from the editor in question. Time went on. (It's a way time has.) Editorial changes were made and the script was not returned. Four queries to the editorial department remained unanswered, and recently the author received a letter that the concern was not responsible for lost scripts. The author has a signed statement from the then editor saying he is holding the script. The author wishes his story or $25. If he is not accorded a fair deal we shall publish a photograph of the editorial acknowledgment and all the correspondence which we have in our possession. It will prove interesting to other writers.

Rather A Nifty Idea

Eugene Valentine Brewster, editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, has written some prize-winning pictures and has taken some prize-winning pictures. Queer statement? Not at all. Editor Brewster is an artistic photographer, and a series of his prize-winning snapshots are printed on post cards which he occasionally sends to friends. It's an original idea and can be expected from an original and successful editor.

He Is Long-Suffering

L. S. McCloskey, editor of the Lubin Company, is long-suffering. He is "hooked up" with the undersigned as a center of attack from "schools" and "professors." We wish to assume all the burden. Mr. McCloskey furnished those "school" letters of "graduates" upon our repeated request. We alone are responsible. Mr. McCloskey's sentiments against correspondence schools are no more severe than those expressed by Editors Hoadley, Plimpton, Schulberg, Sargent, Warren, Vinton, Saunders and many others. They have all been printed in this department.

Vale, Photoplaywright!

A monthly publication printed at Boonville, Ind., and called The Photoplaywright, is no more.

Corralling Ideas

Abraham Lincoln is quoted as saying: "I never let an idea escape me, but write it on a piece of paper and put it in a drawer. In that way I sometimes save my best thoughts on a subject." Ideas are the principal stock in trade for the motion picture playwright. Let nothing escape. When you get a good idea, stop and jot it down in a notebook. Don't try to remember it until later. Capture it then and there. Crede Haskins Calhoun has some good ideas on system which are printed in the current issue of The Magazine Maker. While the hints are intended for fiction writers, the pictureplay writer can utilize them. We take the liberty of quoting in part:

Lincoln's advice is excellent, as everyone will admit, but in order to have a drawer we must first have a desk, and there are many young writers who have not yet reached that desk stage of their literary development. Therefore, just before the advancement to a highly polished mahogany flat-top is the period of the literary letter file. The best file is made of heavy pasteboard with a wooden back, and measures about 12 by 11½ inches and is 3 inches deep. The lid fastens down with a good spring clasp which makes the receptacle dust-proof. Inside it is divided by strong manila leaves, alphabetically lettered, that slide up and down on a rod at the back of the file. This equipment can be purchased at any bookstore and the cost is not worth mentioning. Here can be kept carbon copies of all finished manuscripts, and attached to the first page of each on an extra piece of paper a convenient market record of the original can be written. The filing is done according to the alphabetic arrangement by the initial letters of the title. Thus a glance through my file reveals under "B" "Banana and the Sardine," a short story; "Bishop, Joseph Bucklin," a personality sketch; "Boy Scouts in Panama." an article; and so on. There is little danger of losing or misplacing a manuscript if it is properly filed. When a tale comes back, as most of them do several times, it is placed with the carbon copy and proper notation is made on the market record. There it lies flat until remailed, when it looks fresh and new again. In the same file can be placed all the notes and miscellany of the writer's stock in trade. However, I have found it most convenient to use three: one for fiction, a second for general articles, and a third for photographs and personality sketches. For instance, in the fiction file I have half-finished stories, and to the title page of each, notes, plot-ideas and everything connected with the development of the tale are attached. There you have it all at your finger-tips. If you are going on a journey, you cannot take your desk with you, and the idea that was filed in the drawer is beyond your reach. The letter file can be carried with you by means of a small strap, or placed inside a suitcase. Then when you get the just right "hunch" for say, "The Mother Tongue," turn immediately to "M" in your letter file and you have all the notes that you have made on that particular piece of work. Now close your letter file, place it across your knees, and, presto, you have a convenient place to do your writing. That is where this little sketch was written, while the writer was traveling on a tediously slow Central American train.

Pertinent Pointers

Don't write personal letters to the editor.

Have pride enough to write your own scripts.

A story is not a string of incidents. It's a story and has a plot.

Write your scenes connectedly and have each carry along the plot you wish to develop.

Suspense, sustained interest, tenseness, uncertainty, logic and naturalness are prime essentials.

When the newspapers carry the Ohio floods, the Turkish war, or the President's message on the front pages, do not write stories on those subjects. Editors dread to see a big story "break" in the newspapers because every fool writer in the country sends in a plot bearing on it.

Securing ideas from newspapers is an art in itself. Not everybody can do it. A newspaper writer having access to hundreds of "exchanges" can frequently get a good idea from an obscure item. However, these people are trained newspaper readers.

Don't be egotistical. Just because you have written a story is no reason it is the best in the world. The editor and director may not think it a story at all. The writers of varied experience all have scripts rejected.

There will always be a market for the one-reel story. Learn to write this kind excellently well before endeavoring to write multiple-reel action.

You can market your own script as expeditiously as can any Bureau. In some studios you stand the better chance of the two.

American is buying copyrighted Street & Smith stories. This firm is employing an official "detector," so do not down year-before-last Popular Magazines and write scripts therefrom.

Prepare the Rice Shower

Mr. B. P. Schulberg, popular with the army of script writers, will become a Benedict on—well—we are sworn to secrecy. However, B. P. deserves the best wishes of the entire script-writing family and you can address him care Famous Players Film Company, New York City.

A Photoplay Page

The Waterbury, Conn., American (where the watches come from) publishes a workmanlike moving picture page. It is a relief to look it over after reading the "syndicated dope" that seeks to educate the picture playwright. If the editor of the page will send along his name, we will be pleased to give him deserved recognition. The editor in alluding to moving picture play blunders, scores those breech-loading field pieces which were unknown in Civil War days, but which bob up serenely in many of the films that now seek to depict the times that tried men's souls.

A WINDOW ON WASHINGTON PARK

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Vitagraph Release)

IT was one of those sunshiny days in early spring that always persuade you by their brightness that it is warm. Then you go out without your overcoat and are miserable all day.

Alex Dale, the author, stood by a window of his apartment overlooking Washington Park and watched the people below as they hurried or strolled, according to whether they wore their coats.

There were a few occupants of the benches. Alex began to study these, first idly, then with growing interest. On one bench were three children deeply absorbed in a bag of candy. Just what system should be used in the division of it seemed to be the main problem. On a bench slightly apart from any other one, sat a young girl and a youth. They were plainly dressed, but the light that shone in their faces spoke of something money could not buy. A third bench held a woman of middle age. She sat huddled up beneath a dirty, ragged shawl, her head against the back of the bench—one who had met the world and had been conquered by it.

Dale's eyes traveled to the benches nearest his window. There was but one occupant. An old man sat upon one of them. His clothes were very shabby, but there was something in the carriage of the head and in the general manner that would have attracted the attention of any passer-by.

Dale stood watching the old man for some time. "By Jove, he's just the character for my book," he thought.

The author had lived alone since his wife died a year before, and had devoted himself to his work. But somehow his book that he was engaged in writing did not go as well as it should. His loneliness was wearing on him. No matter how much he tried to throw himself into his work, nor how many hours a day he was closeted with his thoughts and manuscript, the loneliness seemed to cast a pall over him and he could not do his best.

He turned away from the window and walked round the room for a few moments. He looked at his watch. It was almost time for his dinner. He sighed. He was always especially lonesome at dinner. Then he walked back to the window to watch the sun sink behind the tall buildings on the other side of the park.

The old man was still on the bench. He had turned up the collar of his coat to protect his neck from the chilliness of evening.

"Poor old fellow," said Dale, almost aloud. "He must be as lonely as I am—maybe more so." Suddenly he wheeled away from the window and called loudly, not stopping to ring, "James, James, come here quickly."

"Look here," he said excitedly, when the butler had appeared, "do you see that old man on that first bench?" James said he did. "You go over there as quick as you can and tell him I wish to see him and want to know if he will be good enough to visit me. And when you return see that there is dinner for two. Hurry, James, he might go."

"But, sir," protested James, "he might not be——"

"Do as I say," commanded Dale. "I don't care whether he is or not."

"Very well, sir."

The old man looked up in surprise, not unmixed with suspicion, when the butler delivered his message.

"Whom did you say wishes to see me?" he asked almost incredulously.

"Mr. Alex Dale. He lives in the house across the way. Will you come?"

"But why does Mr. Dale wish to see me?" the old man insisted.

"I don't know, sir; he saw you from his window and sent me to invite you."

"May I ask you what kind of a man Mr. Dale is? I am sure I may be pardoned for doing so under the circumstances."

In spite of the fact that James did not at all approve of this inivtation, his pride in his master was aroused. "Indeed, he is a very nice man," he declared, "a fine man he is, and proud you would be to meet him."

"Well—very well, I will go with you," he finally consented.

Alex met them at the door of his apartment.

"Come in," he said cordially to the old man. "I will tell you at once why I have done so strange a thing. It is very simple. I live alone, but for my servants, and at times I get very lonely. I was particularly so this afternoon. I looked from my window and saw you sitting on the bench. You, too, looked lonely, so I took the liberty of sending my butler to speak to you. Will you forgive me, sir, and give me the great pleasure of having you with me at dinner?"

Tears came to the old man's eyes as he said, "But you do not know me."

"I know that you are a gentleman. That is sufficient."

"Do you see that even in spite of these shabby clothes?" the old man asked, his face beaming with pleasure.

"Yes, even in spite of them. Will you stay with me?"

"Yes, gladly."

The dinner was soon ready and Dale and his guest seated at the table. At first the meal was eaten in silence. Then the old man said:

"Well, to tell you the truth, friend, this is the first meal like this I've eaten for many a day. I used to have them served like this all the time."

"Yes," said Dale, seeing that the old man was in a reminiscent mood.

He said nothing more about himself until they were drinking their coffee.

"Your man said you were a writer," he began.

"Yes, I am," acknowledged Dale. "I'm doing a book now but it's not going as easily as it should."

A far-away look came into the old man's eyes. "I've heard that writer-people like to hear other people's stories. Would you care to hear mine?" he asked.

SCENE FROM "A WINDOW ON WASHINGTON PARK"

"Indeed I should," exclaimed Dale, enthusiastically, "if you don't mind telling it."

"No, I think I'd rather like to tell it to you."

They sat in silence for a while, and then the old man began:

"I was born in South Carolina. My father owned a large rice plantation and was very wealthy. Somehow he did not suffer the loss of many Southern planters during the war, so that at his death I, being his only heir, was left in splendid financial condition.

"I soon married and lived an ideal life of happiness until the birth of my only child, which caused my wife to be taken from me. The child was a girl and very like her mother. I was devoted to her. We became more and more companionable as she grew, and while she could not fill her mother's place, she did so as much as anyone could.

"The girl grew into a beautiful woman, and, as was to be expected, wished to marry when she found the right man. I did not make any objection for, fortunately, she had chosen well, and I was content.

"She had met the man here in New York and came here to live after her marriage. I came often to visit her the first few years. She and her husband were happy, just as her mother and I had been, and it did my heart good to see it."

The old man's eyes were very soft as he stopped and sat looking far away.

"Well," he continued, "on one of my visits here I became interested in the stock market and began to speculate. Somehow it grew on me and I went in deeper and deeper. At first I made much money—until I thoroughly got the fever, and then I began to lose. But it was too late. I could not stop. Oh, it is an old story. I've seen dozens of men go the same way.

"My daughter and son-in-law know nothing of this. When my money began to go I stayed away from them. They did not know I was here most of the time, and when they did they thought I was on a flying business trip.

"Well, things went from bad to worse until I had to sell the plantation. This nearly broke my heart, for I wanted my daughter to have every inch of it.

"After I had straightened things out the best I could there was little left. I was ashamed to see my daughter and so went West without doing so. I had a hope that I might still be able to get back something of what I had lost. I wrote my daughter that I was called West on important business and would send an address later. But I never did."

Dale suddenly arose and was about to speak, but he sat down again in silence.

"I stayed out West for ten years but I never made any money to speak of. I just managed to live.

"One day I decided to come back to New York. I didn't know what I'd do when I got here but I wanted to come back. So I came.

"Shortly after my return a letter came to me. It had so many addresses on it you could hardly count them. It had followed me from place to place for nearly a year. I found it was from my son-in-law telling me of my daughter's death."

Again Dale sprang up. This time he walked nervously to the window and back again. "Please tell me the rest," he urged.

"Well, there really isn't anything more. That is thirty years ago. I've been here ever since. I went to the address given in the letter but some strangers were living in the house and had never heard of my son-in-law. I have done what looking I could but an old man in New York hasn't much chance of finding anyone when he hasn't money. Besides, he may not be here now. Or he may be dead. Thirty years is a long time—a long time."

He was silent and sat gravely twisting his napkin between his fingers.

"Tell me, please," said Dale huskily, "tell me what your name is. You didn't say when you came in and I did not think to ask you. Tell me."

"Why, so I did forget to introduce myself. I beg your pardon, Mr. Dale. My name is John Alston."

"Would you mind telling me you son-in-law's name?"

"Why, no. Perhaps you have heard of him. His name was Alexander.

"And your daughter's name was Alice!" cried Dale, grabbing the old man's hands, "and I am her son and your grandson!"

"Why, why—what are you saying? How could that be?"

"My name is not Dale," explained that excited man, "I only use that as a pen name. I am John Alexander and my mother was Alice Alston. I was nine years old when my mother died and I remember my father trying to find my grandfather, whom I had never seen. My father died two years after mother. I know now why I had to send for you this afternoon."

The tears ran down Dale's cheeks unchecked. He and the old man clung to each other.

"We will stay together always," said the young man, "and then neither of us will ever be lonesome again."

"My little grandson—my daughter's child," was all the old man could say.

THE BAWLEROUT

(Reliance 3-Reel)

A story dealing with the withering influence of the loan shark and his business principles, holds particular interest for the majority of people. "The Bawlerout," soon to be released from the Reliance studio, treating as it does of this theme, is most satisfactory in almost every point.

Edgena De Lespine, as the "bawlerout" has made a great deal of the role, and it must be admitted that she "gets over" with the greatest poignancy; and at the point of the story where she turns on the loan shark, displaying the open frankness of her nature and refusing any longer to be connected with the disgraceful methods of business followed by the loan shark, she gets her audience with a vengeance.

The climax of the story is attained when through the extravagance of his daughter, the president of the bank is forced into the clutches of the loan shark and through the investigation and clever manipulations of the "bawlerout" and a certain philanthropist, the loan shark is caught with the goods and arrested.

One scene in the development of the picture which might be open to criticism, is the scene in the bank, where, after the loan shark has decided to close on Dick, the secretary of the bank president, who also is in the clutches of the loan shark, the bank clerks assail the "bawlerout," jostling her and almost dragging her coat off—quite a rough-house scene. This latter might be questioned, but on the whole the picture is good.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Reliance

"The Hoodoo Pearls" has quite a well constructed story and has more or less originality of plot.

Majestic

"Old Mammy's Charge" is full of human interest. Needless to say, it is a Southern story, but the pictured brutality of the overseer in the story, although a possible representation of what has been, may cause considerable comment, especially in the South.

Kay-Bee!

"For Love of the Flag," in two reels, has a poorly constructed story. The plot is not strong, and the finale is a far-fetched idea.

Broncho

"The Fugutive," also a two-reel production, has considerable merit, and holds the interest of the audience. The development of the story is consistent and smooth.

Keystone

"A Darktown Belle" has little merit. But "A Little Hero," on the same reel, is a very acceptable bit, the dog and cat in the story eliciting a great deal of interest.

"Mabel Makes a Frightful Mistake" is truly funny, and will get many a laugh.

Thanhouser

"Rosie's Revenge," with Riley Chamberlin in the lead, is good. As a comedy it is one of the best recently presented.

"An American in the Making" is most excellent and instructive, showing the inner workings of the manufactories of the United States Steel Corporation, the safety devices for the protection of workmen, etc. The story treats of a young emigrant who gets a start in America, and being guided into the right channel, is molded into a fine American citizen, his first work being with the United States Steel Corporation.

Biograph

"A Frightful Blunder" is tremendously tense in the development. The story is good and the production smooth, but we must admit it is a nerve-racker.

Pathe

"The Sponge Industry in Cuba" is instructive and interesting.

"Glimpses of the National Capital" is also of special interest. Both of these films are to be recommended in educational work.

Essanay

"The Unknown" is clever in its conception. In this picture the director has been most successful in clothing the final outcome in a cloak of absolute mystery, which proves a tremendous lure to the interest of the spectator. This film is a very excellent one.

Lubin

"The Right Road" has an irresistible grip. It is a Western story, and a good one. The plot is consistent and interesting and has been well developed in the picture.

Selig

"The Tie of the Blood" is quite a good offering, barring one or two inconsistencies, such as the hero of the story receiving a letter addressed to him at Tucson, Ariz., when he is just on the point of starting from New York for Arizona. On the whole, however, it is good.

Nestor

"When Father Was Kidnapped" is fair comedy, but based on the same old story of elopement.

Rex

"The Wayward Sister" is very excellent in many respects. It is a story that touches the heart but is somewhat disappointing at the finale.

Powers

"Pelleas and Melisande," with Florence Crawley and Arthur Maude in the leads, is an ambitious production, which, however, reflects credit on Director McDonald. There was a difference of opinion among reviewers, however, as to the implied nature of the love between Pelleas and Melisande, which we have been taught to suppose is a go-between platonic love and sexual attraction. This, however, is merely a matter of discussion upon which there might be great difference of opinion. The productions covers three reels.

"Beauty and the Beast," also from the Powers studio, and produced by H. C. Matthews, is exceedingly good. This production will be a delight to grown-ups as well as children. The only criticism we would venture is that there is a lack of uniformity of costuming noticeable, some of the women's gowns being of too modern a cut to correspond with the period in which the story has been cast.

Vitagraph

"Playing with Fire" is a very excellent drama. The story is good, the plot consistently worked out, and the production all that could be desired. The feminine lead in this film imparts a marvellous charm to her work.

Edison

"The Man from the West," with Mabel Trunelle in the feminine lead, is full of human interest, a great many pretty and pathetic touches being worked into the production by its players. The man from the West, the plain old country chap, is the one that makes the wheels of joy continue to turn.

Kalem

"The Millionaire's Playground" is quite an interesting study of millionaire sports at their summer resting places.

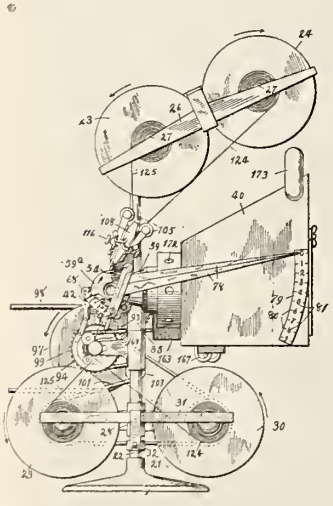
MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

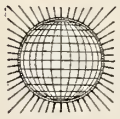
Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

Apropos to the proposed confiscation of property in patents by means of compulsory license and other questionable expedients, proposed in the Oldfield Bill, the status of patent property as defined by Walker is worthy of quotation, i..e,: "Patents are property, the owner of a patent is legally and equitably entitled to the same protection that the owner of any other species of property may enjoy. . . . The right of property which an inventor has in his invention is excelled in point of dignity by no other property right whatever. It is equalled in point of dignity only by the rights which authors have in their copyrighted books. The inventor is not the pampered favorite of the Government or of the nation. The benefits which he confers are greater than those which he receives. He does not cringe at the feet of power, nor secure from authority an unbought privilege. He confers upon mankind a new means of lessening toil or of increasing comfort, and what he gives cannot be destroyed by use nor lost by misfortune. It is henceforth an indestructible heritage of prosperity. On the other hand, he receives from the Government nothing which cost the Government or the people a dollar or a sacrifice. He receives nothing but a contract which provides that for limited times he may exclusively enjoy his own. Compared with those who acquire property by gift or marriage, compared with those who acquire property by profits or sales or by interest on money, the man who acquires property in inventions, by creating things unknown before, occupies a position of superior dignity. Even the man who creates value by manual labor, though he rises in dignity above the heir, the dunce, the merchant, and the money lender, falls in dignity below the author and inventor."

The chief objects of the improvements which form the subject matter of Letters Patent No. 1,056,794 issued to Albert S. Howell, of Chicago, Ill., are: To provide a mechanism for photographically printing upon a continuous strip of prepared material; to furnish a film printing appliance that will operate while both negative and positive strips are fed through the printing chamber with a uniform and uninterrupted motion, and to produce an apparatus so constructed as to eliminate the transparent backing for the films heretofore employed, thus producing a free and unobstructed passage between the source of illumination and the negative film, avoiding the loss of intensity which follows the passage of the light rays through media having different refractive indexes; and as the full actinic action of the light is received by the exposed surfaces, positives of maximum excellence will be produced. Other objects of the invention are to provide means for varying the quantity of the light beams during the printing process, to furnish an automatic signal device for the purpose of indicating the proper point of time at which any change in the quantity of light is to be made, and to arrange suitable stop devices in connection with graduations which will enable the operator to bring the quantity of light to a predetermined degree with speed and accuracy. As a precautionary measure to prevent the exposure of the sensitized film to destructive rays when the conduit gate is in its open position, an automatic current interrupter is provided operable by said gate, and adapted to break the lamp circuit whenever the gate is opened.



The accompanying figure is a side elevation of the apparatus of which there are 18 views in all, and as the specification contains over 800 folios and 21 claims, to give a full synopsis would be impossible within these prescribed limits.



Film manufacturers, and manufacturers of Kinematographic apparatus generally, ought to be interested in a resolution passed at the Newcastle meeting of the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, urging the British Government, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to press upon foreign governments the necessity of establishing an international law that "first public use" shall be the fundamental condition of ownership of a trademark. At present in some countries priority of registration is sufficient to exclude use by rightful owners, with obvious encouragement of piracy and unjust competition. This movement for a world-wide recognition of trademark proprietorship will probably be brought up for consideration and decision at the next International Conference for the Protection of Industrial Property.

Charles Delac, of Paris, France, has applied for the registration of the trade-mark herewith represented, as applied to Kinetographic Bands and Films, Apparatuses or Cameras for Taking Up, Printing and Projecting Kinematographic Advertising Bills or Programs, used since January, 1910.

Means for protecting the inflammable film against ignition are many and various. Charles P. Hulburd, of Los Angeles, Cal., proposes to do this positively, and reduce fire insurance rates, etc., by passing the rays from the condensers 2-3 through a sealed compartment 12 containing a light transmitting heat intercepting liquid composed of alum solution or the like, so that the light passing through the picture film 4 and projecting lenses 5 and 6 will be relatively cool. A float in the container 12 closes the light apertures if the liquid is lacking; and official seals 10 and 27 will prevent unlawful tampering with the device, provided ordinances can be passed rendering the use of such devices compulsory. The inventor claims the combination with a motion picture machine having a base, a light emitting element, light condensing lenses and a motion picture film; of a container provided with transparent panes, a light passage between said panes, and a float chamber above the light passage; means to seal the container to the base; a transparent liquid heat-interseptting body in the container between the panes; a float in the container adapted to be held by the liquid above such light passage and adapted to obstruct the light passage when the liquid is wanting; a top for the container; and means to seal said top in place. Patent No. 1,0057,059.

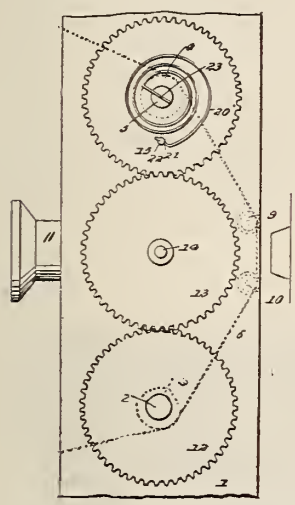
An innovation by the Pathe folks of Paris is a "self-contained" self-lighting Kinetoscope intended for use exclusively in homes or schools, both for education and recreation. Mounted along with the crank mechanism is a small dynamo connected with an over-volted metallic filament lamp, so that by increasing the current above the standard a very bright light is attained, projecting a clear image on the screen. Incombustible films are used, somewhat smaller than standard; and the whole apparatus is "independent"; may be set up anywhere ready for use, and is well within the reach and control of amateurs. If it is fool-proof and becomes as popular as the Pathe Weekly there'll be millions in it, and the rooster will have an additional cause to crow.

It is well known that the tension exerted on the film is an important factor in moving picture machines and that heretofore the films have suffered much irregularity in this respect. The gist of Carl Green's invention set forth in Letters Patent No. 1,057,234 consists essentially in the interposition of a take-up spring 20 between the upper driving gear 15 pivotally connected to the shaft 5 and the upper sprocket wheel 4 which is rigidly secured to said shaft. By this means the film is held taut under all conditions, whether stationary or traveling, the usual star and pin movement on shaft 2 being employed to effect the advance and detention of the film. The inventor claims that by this means he can dispense with the rubber rollers heretofore employed to produce tension; replace stationary tension devices, and provide a machine which will be much easier to run, reducing the wear and tear on films, and at the same time eliminating the jerky motion so common in most moving picture machines. Furthermore there is nothing to scratch or cut the film, the operation is practically noiseless, and the motion of the film may be reversed if desired. The wear on the sprockets and star wheel is also reduced. The patent claims broadly the combination with the upper and lower intermittently movable film-engaging sprockets and their shafts, said sprockets being fast upon their shafts, of gearing connecting said shafts for intermittently moving the film, one of the gears being loose upon its shaft, and a moving torque device for said film movable with said loose gear and constructed to be put under tension to normally keep the film stretched.



Gross receipts of $199,200,000 by the Bell telephone system in a single year would indicate that talk is not so very cheap after all; and consider what it cost to learn motion pictures to talk synchronously and what it will cost the public to hear them.

ANOTHER ILLUSTRATION OF THE LAW'S DELAY

A bill pending in the Kansas Legislature provides that "when two trains approach a crossing both shall stop, and neither shall go ahead until the other has passed by."

This is a perfectly safe proposition, although at cross purposes; but such legislation can hardly be called "progressive."

Commissioner Moore has decided that "RITESIZE" is wholly fanciful and registrable as a trade-mark, not being descriptive when applied to articles of manufacture of various sizes.

Who would wish to live forever if the paintings the Futurists perpetrate are prognostic?

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

THE KINEMACOLOR FILTER

As in every new art, perfection is reached only by stages of development.

As the result of many months of most laborious and expensive research work, conducted in both Mr. Urban's London laboratories and our own, a discovery has been made which beyond all doubt marks the greatest single step ever made in the advancement of Kinemacolor.

You are doubtless familiar with the many difficulties which the black-and-white producers had to overcome (during the carly stages of the moving picture industry) before they were able to project a light, bright picture—one that could be readily seen and was pleasing to the eye.

In the Kinemacolor process, owing to the necessity of projecting the light through colored filters, the absorption of the light rays by the filters has increased manyfold the difficulties with which the early producers of black and white had to contend.

Our problem has been in effect to find a transparent color ingredient, and it is the discovery of this remarkable ingredient (or rather combination of ingredients), its application to the Kinemacolor filter, and the remarkable results which have been attained in exhaustive demonstrations, that makes the step of such great importance.

This ingredient, while acting as a non-absorbent of light rays, yet gives full effect to all color values. As a consequence of this new invention the Kinemacolor pictures can now be projected with practically the same amperage required for good black and whites. Formerly Kinemacolor required fully 100 amperes, but the new light filter cuts this figure almost in half.

The Kinemacolor factories at Whitestone are working overtime, turning out the new filters as fast as possible, and within a week or ten days they will be installed on every Kinemacolor machine in the East—to the great saving of exhibitors using the Kinemacolor. It is estimated that the saving on the ten Balkan War and Panama Canal shows alone will amount to a considerable sum—probably enough to pay the salaries of the lecturers.

ATLANTIC FLEET MANOEUVRES FILMED FOR FIRST TIME

Carl von Hoffmann, Universal Camera Man, Accorded Extraordinary Courtesy by United States Government. —Result Will Soon Be Shown On Screen

Probably the biggest achievement in the history of motion picture making is the taking of the recent manoeuvres of the United States Atlantic Fleet by Cameraman Carl von Hoffmann of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

The diplomacy that this involves, the influence that had to be exerted, and the requirements that had to be observed before the coveted permission of the Government was obtained, all these constitute a story in themselves, scarcely secondary in interest to the results.

It was on March 5th when Carl von Hoffmann, former officer in the Imperial Russian Army during the Japanese-Russian War, and now Universal cameraman, returned to New York, after a wearisome session ot the Inauguration of President Wilson. Reporting at the Universal offices in the Mecca Building, he was immediately ordered to report for duty at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Without even waiting to shave, he obeyed the order.

He found the United States gunboat Culgoa, provision ship of the Atlantic Fleet, ready to sail to Guantanamo, Cuba. Through Governmental orders, quarters were provided for von Hoffmann, by Commander Lieutenant Lyons, and the voyage was commenced. After three days the gunboat entered the Gulf Stream, where they encountered a great storm, which put half the crew, as well as von Hoffmann, in their bunks. After two days in the Stream, they found calm at Bird Rock Island in the Bahamas. They encountered another storm before they reached Guantanamo the following Monday. Here they were given a rousing welcome by the awaiting fleet, a scene which von Hoffmann succeeded in filming in its entirety.

Standing on the foc'sle deck, with his camera pointed at the fleet, he obtained a panoramic view of the beautiful tropic bay, the winter home of the Fleet. With cannons booming, colors dipping and other manifestations of respect, the provision ship took its designated berth and dropped anchor. After Commander Lyons had reported to the chief of staff, Commander Hughes, a busy scene was enacted. Launches, sailboats and punts by the hundreds hurried to and fro over the smooth waters, a most animated scene. An incident of the stay at Guantanamo was a smoker on the U. S. S. Idaho, which was wonderfully decorated with palms and other tropical plants as well as festoons of bunting for the occasion. An arena was roped off and therein occurred a pugilistic match for the light-weight championship of the navy. Lieutenant von Hoffmann was introduced to the officers by Ensign Carver, who knew the war experiences of the cameraman in the Russian forces. After two days the Culgoa departed for Cuba, and the cameraman was transferred to the U. S. S. Florida, where he was accorded a hospitable reception by the officers in the ward mess room. While at Guantanamo, von Hoffmann secured 40,000 feet of film showing the Florida "coaling ship" from the U. S. Auxiliary Neptune, the largest collier in the world. Four hundred tons of coal an hour were put aboard, and during the process the erstwhile dazzling ship of white was transformed into ebony, while its immaculate crew took on the semblance of chimney sweeps. It is a wonderful picture, with everybody busy, and everybody happy, with the orchestra on the top deck entertaining the crew while they work. On the following Saturday night, Lieutenant von Hoffmann, at the invitation of Admiral Winslow, gave a lecture before an audience of 2,000 persons, including the officers and their wives, and the men of the fleet. His subject was "Making of Moving Pictures," and his wartime experiences in Manchuria.

During the remainder of the stay of the Fleet in the harbor, von Hoffmann secured some wonderful scenes. A particularly beautiful sunset, with a Rembrandt sky; the baseball game between the crews of the Utah and Florida. with the officers and men cheering the winning plays; and rowing races on the bay are also shown.

The Fleet left Guantanamo at night, with all lights out, and in regular fighting formation. The only relief to the enveloping darkness was the occasional flash of a signal from the torpedo boats, employed in the evolutions. It was a wonderfully impressive experience.

The Fleet encountered a big storm in returning to American waters, but the manoeuvres went on just the same. Tangier Sound on the Eastern Shore of Virginia was eventually reached, and here firing practice with the old San Marcos as the target, was participated in by the gunners. Later von Hoffmann was transferred to the Utah to enable him to take pictures of the target practice, which was notable on account of the wonderful marksmanship displayed, each shot costing $400. The pictures also include an intimate depiction of life on board ship, with the pastimes of the crew, and their mascots and pets. Finally the Universal cameraman was transferred to the U. S. Flagship Wyoming, the largest fighting vessel in the world. He was permitted to take some more important pictures on this ship, and as it was during the time that the Fleet was visited by the new Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels, and other members of the Cabinet, the films are of extraordinary historical interest. The pictures show the honorable guests and the ladies of the Cabinet and official circles, including Miss Eleanor Wilson, daughter of the President, being received by Rear Admiral Badgern, the Commander of the Fleet, and watching from the bridge the firing of the great guns. Eight salvos of the twelve 12-inch guns were fired in their honor. The concussion was so great that the camera was knocked down, but recovering his equilibrium, von Hoffmann finished a most interesting series. On April 2nd, after nearly a month of the most interesting adventure, under advantages for observation such as previously never have been extended to a motion picture cameraman, Lieutenant Carl von Hoffmann was put ashore at Old Point Comfort and hurried to New York with his prized negatives. Their early exhibition on the screen will be awaited with anticipation.

ECLAIR

SONS OF A SOLDIER (May 7).—This newest three-reel Eclair feature is nothing if not hroad in scope, taking the spectator back, as it does, into the crinoline days of the American Revolution, leading him through the dark and troublesome years, pregnant with drama, of the great War of the Rebellion, and finally projecting him forward into a purely imaginative, but not on tbat account improhahle, period when the country finds itself forced at last to face the growing peril of the Far East. To secure the many beautiful and gripping scenes which are necessary to tbe unfolding of this cycle-drama, a company has traveled the entire length of the Atlantic Coast, from New York to Key West, and there is hardly a state of the Eastern seahoard which has not contributed its share to this very cosmopolitan picture.

The earlier scenes depict the members of the older branches of the Primrose family in the trying crises of the Revolution and the Civil War, showing their mettle and preparing the way for the incidents of the main narrative, in which the sons of that sterling race become prominent factors in the fearful death grapple of East with West.

Young George Primrose, on leaving West Point, receives a lieutenant's commission, and is detailed at once for active service in the war. Shortly after his departure, his older brother is elected to the office of President. The ancient homestead of the Primroses, which has sheltered four generations of patriotic scions of this tree, has fallen into the hands of the Japanese, who are using it as their military headquarters. The grandfather of the two boys, an old soldier of Lookout Mountain and Gettysburg, though driven from his home and failing in health, is yet a lusty and active partisan, fighting vicariously for the land he loves through the medium of his two grandsons.

Lieutenant Primrose is sent to the commander-in-chief with a dispatch of vital importance. Attempting a short-cut through an everglade, he loses his horse and becomes himself bemired, his strength having been undermined by a fresh wound from the carbine of a Japanese guerilla. Just as he has fainted from exhaustion. Denison, his sometime classmate at West Point, comes upon him. This man hates the young officer, as he has been an unsuccessful aspirant for the hand of Polly Blake, Primrose's fiancee. Denison extracts the paper from Primrose's belt and makes good his escape.

The hue and cry is out after the young lieutenant. The evidence all points to desertion. Denison pursues his advantage with the girl, declaring that he has tried to retrieve his friend's disgrace by delivering the dispatch himself. He produces the paper as proof. Primrose is ultimately found and brought on to Washington for court martial. Denison's testimony turns the case, and the order is issued to shoot the traitor. The old grandfather, who loves the boy more than anything in the world, is the most unrelenting of his judges.

On the day set for the execution, Polly Blake arrives at the Capitol and demands immediate audience with President Primrose. She has discovered a thumb mark in blood on the dispatch which Denison gives her. The fact that the latter has received no wound, arouses her suspicions. The thumb print is identified as George Primrose's. The President's reprieve saves his brother from a disgraceful death at the last moment, and the treachery of young Denison is unmasked to the world.

FRONTIER

THE SHERIFF'S RIVAL (May 8).—Since childhood the sheriff and Edythe have been sweethearts, but their love, as far as Edythe is concerned, has never progressed beyond the boy and girl stage. With the sheriff it is different. He is shy and awkward when it comes to telling her so, but he loves Edythe with his whole heart. Because he understands the human male animal he does not lose his temper when his deputies administer a ruthless joshing as they catch him starting for Edythe's home with a huge bouquet. Despite the laughing espionage by a brother, Edythe and the sheriff manage to put in a very pleasant evening.

Not long after this a stranger arrives in town. This stranger is a gambler, who is known to Edythe's brother, and who is well supplied with money. Before he has gone a dozen yards from the stage which brought him, he is offering to buy a drink. Because of this acquaintanceship with her brother it is a very easy matter for him to secure an introduction to Edythe, when he sees her riding into town. Lee, the sheriff, sees this introduction and is much hurt by it.

The introduction paves the way for an acquaintanceship which fast ripens. Edythe rides much with the gambler, and it seems that the sheriff has in him an able rival. As time goes on and their friendship grows, Edythe and the gambler are more and more together. One day Lee sees them embrace, and after a brief flash of temper realizes that there is no hope for this affair any longer. He relinquishes Edythe to the gambler in his mind.

By an accident the sheriff later sees upon the gambler's arm a scar and asks about it. He is really careless about the matter, but the gambler attaches some concern to the question. A sheriff comes from a neighboring county searching for a man wanted for manslaughter. While he talks to Lee about him, giving a description from which Lee recognizes the gambler, through the scar, a deputy posts the town with offers of a reward for this man. The gambler sees one. Realizing that the officers are after him, and growing desperate, he jumps upon a nearby horse and makes a hurried flight.

Meanwhile Lee is having a struggle with himself. For Edythe's sake he desires to shield the gambler, while as an officer he should aid in his capture. He solves the question by denying knowledge of the man. To make this act compatible with his official capacity he feels that he must resign. This he does, somewhat to the surprise of the president of the county supervisors. Then he goes to Edythe's home.

Meanwhile the gambler's horse has gone lame, and he, too, has come to the ranch home. He begs Edythe to hide him. Edythe sees the sheriff entering the gate, apparently in search of the fugitive, and she conceals him in a closet. The sheriff enters and shortly finds, through a couple of involuntary slips made by Edythe, that the gambler is not only in the house, but near him. He places a chair before the door, folds his arms and invites the gambler to come out. This the fugitive does with a rush. He covers the ex-sheriff with a revolver and is about to shoot him, but the cool courage displayed disarms him. For Edythe's sake, Lee gives the gambler his own horse and lets him go.

URBAN-ECLIPSE—GEORGE KLEINE

THE DIVIDING WALL (May 7).—Ernest Wilkinson, plaintiff in a lawsuit started by his grandfather against his country neighbor some years back, receives a letter from his attorney requesting him to call at his office, as a settlement is about to be made.

Simultaneously, Suzanne Johnson, the defendant in the case, receives a like letter.

A wall dividing their properties has been the cause of the feud. Unaware of each other's identity, they become acquainted under the most humorous circumstances on the train going to the country, but the steward of the Wilkinson estate and the housekeeper of the Johnson estate terminate their pleasant conversation when they meet their respective guests at the station.

They arrive at the attorney's office on the appointed day. He quickly sees their thoughts are more of each other than of the lawsuit, and dismisses them for a few days. The dividing wall at this time plays a prominent part in a pretty romantic scene, where a truce of peace is reached between Ernest and Suzanne. However, the bitterness between the servants is not abated.

Ernest and Suzanne are again called to the office of the attorney under the pretext that a decision has been reached.

After they arrive, the attorney, with a mischievous smile, hands each a copy of the judgment. When opened up, it proves to be only an agreement of marriage. A demure smile on the part of the girl, an awkward "will you?" from the man, and the decision is approved by both parties.

The anxiety of the servants brings them to the office entrance, where they impatiently wait the outcome of the case. An argument starts between them; words come thick, until, at last, the wool flies.

Imagine the spectacle they present when out walks Suzanne on Ernest's arm!

CINES—GEORGE KLEINE

When Helen appears, he mistakes her for Lucy, and when his anxious father arrives to see how matters are progressing, Helen is introduced as his fiancee. While Helen is escorted and dined by his father, Albert and Lucy (of whose identity he is still ignorant) love each other, and, leaving a note, they decide to elope.

When the father returns with Helen, he is exasperated. Albert and Lucy are hunted down, and found entering a hotel, where explanations fall thick and fast.

Henry not only wins an heiress, but also possesses the girl he loves.

THANHOUSER

THE GIRL DETECTIVE'S RUSE (April 29).—A gang of counterfeiters made their headquarters in a large city and the police, despite many determined efforts, were unable to arrest them.

One of the cleverest detectives in the city's employ was a young girl who had won a name for courage. She learned that a certain woman counterfeiter, who had been sentenced to prison with her husband, was soon to be released, and a daring plan occurred to her. The convict resembled the detective in appearance, and the latter felt sure that, properly disguised she would be taken for the other woman. Arrangements were accordingly made; the prisoner was detained in the penitentiary, while the detective, wearing the shapeless clothing given to discharged prisoners, slunk out of the prison yard. As she had anticipated, she was met by men who warmly greeted her and escorted her to a waiting automobile.

The woman counterfeiter had been noted as an engraver, and the detective's "friends" were none other than the gang for which the police was in search. At their headquarters the girl, firmly established in the gang's confidence, learned all the information necessary, and sent a cipher message to the chief of police, telling him to raid the place.

The convict's husband escaped from prison on the day set for the raid. He made his way to the counterfeiter's headquarters, and, when presented to his "wife," denounced her as an impostor and a spy. The girl was in great peril, but her courage did not fail her. Seizing a chair, she smashed the lamp and the room was shrouded in darkness. While the angry men floundered around trying to find her, the detective fled to the roof of the building in an effort to elude her pursuers. She was overtaken and seized. Death was very near at hand when policemen poured in from adjoining houses and the counterfeiters were made prisoners.

The girl was complimented for her gallantry and promoted, and the woman whose place she had taken was released from prison and helped to lead an honest life.

THE WIDOW'S STRATAGEM (May 2).—The doctor diagnosed the wealthy widow's case as "too much society." He ordered that she leave the city for the summer and spend at least a couple of months in some quiet farmhouse. With many sighs the order was obeyed, and the woman soon found herself the paying guest of a country woman far from civilization.

At first time hung heavily on the visitor's hands, but she soon learned to reconcile herself to her surroundings. The fare was plain, but good. She passed many happy hours sketching, and lastly there was a "mighty nice boy" who came over almost daily to chat with her.

The widow was young and beautiful, but she never dreamed for a moment of falling in love with the youthful farmer. He, however, was dazzled by the style and beauty of the city resident, and soon was paying much attention to her.

For some little time the widow did not know that she was causing sorrow for another. Her hostess had a daughter, an awkward country girl, and one day this girl confronted the widow. She told her that the young farmer had been her sweetheart, but was now being won away, and, dropping on her knees, she pleaded, "Don't take him away, he is all I have."

The blasé city woman's heart was touched. She felt for the poor little girl, who had had so few joys in life, and tenderly promised her that she would nip the undesired romance in the bud. She did, but the farmer never realized how it was accomplished. He simply found that the woman he had admired was not so beautiful as he had at first believed; that she was coarse and common, so almost insensibly he ceased to care for her and drifted back to the one who steadfastly loved him.

The widow returned to the city, her health fully restored, and again assumed her position in society. The country girl married the man of her choice, and always realized that she owed her happiness to the success of the widow's stratagem.

IT'S GREAT TO BE GREAT (May 8).—Kittie likes Willie, but Kittie's papa likes Willie as he does the barber's itch. Kittie can only see Willie when papa is not around. Papa is scheduled to go out one evening. Kittie notifies Willie to come around and spoon his young life away. As they are billing and cooing, and cooing and billing, father returns for his beard, which he had forgotten. He throws Willie out of the window. Willie lands on the sidewalk. He doesn't bounce. Much battered, he goes into a drug store for treatment. When he emerges his head is all hound round with white cloth. He looks like an Eastern potentate with a turban.

The police department this day have been told of the arrival of a Maharajah, Prince of Kalamazoo. They are told to keep a discreet watch over his movements to see that he doesn't get into trouble.

Every policeman is so notified. When one sees a young man with apparently what is a turban, they believe that it is the Maharajah in disguise. They follow him about, much to his dismay. When he walks, they turkey trot. When he runs, they gallop.

As Willie strolls through the park he meets Kittie. Kittie is glad to see him. They do a little hench warming. The police meanwhile are taking it all in with great zest. Who, then, should come along but Kittie's father. There is now no window out of which to throw Willie. The police believe that papa is an anarchist and they pounce upon him, as he tries to get at Willie. They arrest him and hustle him to the station.

The tears roll down Kittie's brand new complexion and takes the spots out of her green dress, giving it a polka dot effect. Kittie wants some of her papa. She inveigles Willie into going to the station, where her father is raging like an angry sardine.

The chief of police struggles with papa and whispers to him that this is a real live Maharajah, and he should induce him to allow him to become one of his fathers-in-law. It is, of course, expedient for father to bow to the Maharajah, whom the moment before he was ready to devour. All are happy. At the last moment after papa had given his consent to allow Willie to come into the family, a telegram is received. This reads that the Maharajah left town the day before and that, therefore, a police guard is not necessary. Therefore, it is discovered that Willie is only Willie and not a Maharajah.

IN THE WAKE OF THE BRAIN STORM (May 13).—The Marquis of Dartmouth, spending an idle hour in a motion picture theatre, is startled to see on the screens, walking with a man, a woman who amazingly resembles his wife. Their attitude is affectionate to say the least.

Wild with jealousy, he purchases a copy of the film to reassure himself that it cannot be she. The film, however, shows what he did not want to see.

Returning to his country estate, he watches his wife closely. There is nothing to confirm his suspicions.

Obsessed with jealousy, the Marquis waits for something to substantiate the evidence of the film. His wife one day happens to leave on her desk a note: "My dear Helen:—I have paid bitterly for the past. I beg you not to refuse to see the 'exile,' who is due to arrive at Bedda Station at 4:30. You know I love you. Roger."

The Marquis, infuriated, restrains himself with difficulty.

The jealous man had heard his wife give the order for the carriage to be brought. Quickly the Marquis goes outside, where the horses are standing impatiently. Under the harness of one animal he slips several matches, which he calculates at a later moment will explode and cause him to run amuck. After his wife had gone, the Marquis is stricken with remorse. As he is trying to still his conscience, he is visited by the man whom he had seen with her on the film. It was her brother, who, because of some boyish indiscretion, had been renounced by his family, excepting only his sister, who had retained her kindness and affection for him.

Realizing the enormity of his crime, the dis-

Meanwhile the horse, frightened, had dashed off madly. Despite the efforts to control him and his mate, they plunge on toward a high precipice. The coachman is thrown out. The carriage overturns, the Marchioness thrown under the wheels. Here, with but a faint spark of life remaining, she is found by her conscience-stricken husband. She recovers to forgive him for his act of insanity.

PEDRO'S TREACHERY (May 5).—Ned Fields and Helen Andrews are almost sweethearts when Bob Murry, the new foreman, arrives. Helen is immediately infatuated with this handsome cattleman and leaves Ned much chagrined. A Mexican workman observes all this and gives Ned the laugh. Ned knocks him down and Pedro, the Mexican, swears vengeance. Helen and Bob, the new foreman, later get married. Pedro, in the meantime, sees an opportunity to square his account with Ned. He steals Ned's chaps from the bunkhouse, and, disguised by a handkerchief and Ned's hat, sneaks into Andrew's home and steals the money which Bob had procured to pay off the men with. Old man Andrews catches him in the act. A struggle ensues and Andrews is mortally wounded. Ned, returning from searching for some absolute suspect, goes to the door of the house and hears Helen tell Bob and the doctor that she saw Ned disappear through the door as she entered the room. Knowing that no pity will be shown him by the cowmen when they learn of this, he determines to cross the border until he can clear his name and prove his innocence. He does so, and there meets with a Mexican senorita and falls in love with her. Pedro is caught being cruel to an animal and discharged from the Andrews' ranch. He also goes into Mexico and is hired by Juanita, later meeting with Ned. He attempts to bribe Ned by showing him a clipping from a home paper. Pedro, being unable to blackmail Ned, he takes the clipping to the girl, Juanita. Ned calls on Juanita that evening and learns of the act and determines to settle with Pedro. They have a struggle, a revolver is discharged, and Pedro is seriously wounded. The sheriff, in the meantime, has secured evidence of Pedro's guilt through the confession of his. Pedro's squaw appears upon the scene in time to arrest the guilty one and send the sweethearts into each others arms.

KINEMACOLOR

THE MARBLE INDUSTRY AT CARRARA, ITALY.—Very complete views are given in this Kinemacolor of an important Italian industry, whose output is famous throughout the world. In the opening scene, which shows one of the quarries, the color of the rock formation of the district is clearly indicated. Work is proceeding at the rock face, and a compressed air boring machine is shown at work. A method of conveying the marble on skids to the cutters is next illustrated and a huge saw, operated by two men and supported by an elaborate framework, is cutting marble blocks into slabs.

A remarkable view shows 20 tons of marble in a solid block being moved on a lizza, a wooden sledge which runs on steep slipways. The blocks are conveyed to the mason's yard for trimming; six oxen being harnessed to a roughly constructed trolley. This travels on rollers; those which have been passed over being rapidly picked up, pushed over the block of marble to the men in front and used again.

Other views show the marble being drawn by oxen to the railway, and the passage of a laden train over a viaduct. Both these views are remarkable for beautiful settings and backgrounds. Marble slabs are then shipped for exportation. The final view is of a sunset, the sun sinking in mist over the sea like a ball of glowing fire.

A MATTER OF HONOR.—A simple story, strong by the very simplicity of its telling.

Driven to desperation by the marriage of his chum of the girl he loves, Tom grows reckless, gambles and drinks. Frank, happy in his home and business success, reforms Tom and secures him a position in the bank where he himself works.

Speculation in stocks brings Frank to the verge of ruin. He robs the bank and changes the figures in Tom's books. Tom, returning, unexpectedly, catches Frank. Here is a strong scene between the two men. On Frank's promising to replace the money next day, Tom swears for May's sake to keep silent. Next day the defalcation is discovered. Tom is accused, telephones to Frank, only to learn of Frank's departure. For the sake of the woman he loves, he suffers in silence, and is sent to prison. May reads of this in the papers and realizes that Frank is the guilty one.

Out West Frank wins the gratitude of an old Indian by protecting him from cowboys. The Indian shares his rich find of gold with Frank. Climbing the rocks at the mine, Frank falls and is mortally injured. Here is made a sensational plunge from high rocks. The Indian carries the injured man home. Realizing death is near, Frank writes a full confession of his crime and sends it to May with more than enough gold nuggets to pay his defalcation.

May receives the letter and gold, takes it to the bank and Tom is freed.

"After many years" shows Tom and May playing with their child. This dissolves into the old Indian standing by a lonely grave.

SAVED FROM THE GRIP OF ALCOHOL (May 9).—In a little out of the way trading station in the heart of the African wilds, Henry Becker lives happily with his young wife and child. As time goes on his wife cannot endure the climate, and at last she goes to her grave, leaving her husband bowed under the burden of his grief. A faithful nurse takes charge of the child, and Becker goes on with his daily work as best he can. Gradually he succumbs to the temptation to drown his sorrow with wine. Gradually the evil effects of alcohol claim him for their own. He neglects his duty, and spends many hours locked in his study in a drunken stupor.

One day the whole of the members of the station go out hunting big game, but they return home later after a fruitless search. When the hunt is over, Becker returns to his study and spends the rest of the day indulging in one of his usual drunken orgies. Paralyzed by the awful effects of the liquor, he is unable to stir when the nurse's heartrending cry for aid peals through the silent house. The tense moment which follows serves to impress upon the drunkard's deadened sense the fact that some terrible calamity is about to befall. Strive as he will he cannot get his limbs to obey him, and he sinks helpless to the floor.

Meanwhile a fierce forest leopard is prowling around the house, seeking to overtake Becker's little child. The leopard has escaped the hunters, and, made bold by hunger, it dares to enter the habitations of men, and seeks the little child for its prey.

The nurse at last bravely places herself between the leopard and the child. The little one escapes, and the noise of the dreadful struggle is borne to the ears of the powerless Becker. Fortunately assistance from another source arrives in time, and a party of traders drive off the leopard. When they open his study door Becker rolls out, to find his little one is saved, thanks to the efforts of her faithful nurse. He gives thanks for this providential aid, and the lesson he learns suffices to make him scorn the bottle henceforth and do his duty to his little child.

THE BROTHERS (May 5).—Robert and John Gregory were left orphans. Robert, a worthy soul, found his health failing and the doctor advised him to seek the lower levels. John, drunk most of the time, agreed to accompany him.

The Senor Estabon lived with his pretty wife and sister in the little cabin in the valley. Alone in the woods he found Robert and John, Robert prone upon the ground from exhaustion, and John, quite drunk, beside him. The Spaniard took them home and in the days that followed Robert's health returned and he grew to love the Spanish girl. John, on the other hand, made violent love to the wife of the senor, and when she repulsed him, threatened to kill her. Behind the barn Robert came upon them, she struggling to free herself from John's embrace. All ties of blood were swept away in Robert's fury and he struck his brother to the ground. Slinking away John discovered an aged mendicant, who agreed to kill his brother and the senor in consideration of certain money. They went toward the little cabin home and the beggar demanded his money. This John refused, promising pay when the job was done. An argument arose between them. John, in drunken fury, struck the thug, who fell. Turning over on his side the mendicant fired and John dropped dead. A little later the occupants of the little cabin gathered solemnly around his body.

HUMAN KINDNESS (May 8).—Old Jasper, now in his eightieth year, affectionately kissed his aged wife good-bye and started for his day's work on a big estate. Ralph Martin, a young overseer, looked at his watch and spoke roughly to the old man of his tardiness. Old Jasper, without answering, took his spade and rake and started to work. A pretty flower caught his eye and he plucked it. When Miss Mabel, daughter of the owner of the estate, passed by, he offered it to her, but she only frowned and passed him by in silence. A moment later Martin brusquely told him to stop that foolishness. Pretty Betty, from a neighboring estate passed into the big garden on her way to visit Miss Mabel. She took the pretty flower which the kindly old man offered her and pressed it in her book.

Later, with Miss Mabel, she passed him by and smiled kindly. That afternoon a young man applied for work. Martin gave him a peremptory "No." Then seeing old Jasper feebly digging, called him back and hired

A few days later pretty Betty, again visiting Mabel, asked for him. The overseer was called and replied that be had discharged him. Mabel shrugged her shoulders, but the news worried Betty. On a bench in her own garden she picked up her book and found the pressed flower. Then she went to old Jasper's home and gave bim work. PATHE

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 18 (April 28).

THE CORMORANT (April 29).—A seabird, purely and simply, and dwelling in the crevasses of steep cliffs, tbe Cormorant's chief prey is fish. Consequently, it is an expert angler, and wbenever a fish nears the surface of the water, the Cormorant is waiting for it. The Cormorant immerses its head and in the twinkling of an eye the fish is captured. Fishermen use tbese birds to help increase their daily catch. The men fasten a strap on the neck of the Cormorant, and the bird, after catching the fisb, is unable to swallow. When its neck is full of fish the Cormorant returns to its master and leaves tbe fish at his feet, then goes back for more.

On the same reel:

HIDDEN LIFE IN SEAWEED.—A most interesting study of various almost invisible creatures that infest even the commonest seaweed is obtained by means of a Planktonograph.

THE MEXICAN'S DEFEAT (April 30).—Out of revenge a Mexican army captain "frames up" upon an American and his wife evidence of a conspiracy against the Mexican government. The captain, with a guard, calls to search for the evidence that he knows is in the house. The Americans seem to submit to the search, but a moment later, and by clever manœuvering, they have the advantage over the Mexican guard, and before the latter really knows what has taken place the Americans are fast disappearing toward the shelter of a U. S. army post over the border, where they arrive in time to dare the Mexicans to pursue them further.

On the same reel:

THE PANAMA CANAL TO-DY.—The most gigantic engineering project in the world's history is almost completed. The Miraflores, locks and the spillway are opened for the first time, and in this film the camera gives a comprehensive idea of the enormity of the undertaking which will link the Atlantic and Pacific. A timely offering.

THE PARTING ETERNAL (May 1).—When he never received her letter, Donald Morley took it for granted that Mary Leonard did not love him and left his old home. Some years later he is ordained a priest and celebrates his first mass in a convent chapel where Mary is a nun. After the service, and alone before the altar they meet. Mary explains the circumstances of the misunderstanding, but they love each other well enough to put their worldly emotions aside (in a strongly dramatic scene) and hold faithful to the vows which their consciences tell them cannot be violated, and then they part—for eternity. The photographing is well done, and there is a strength in the telling of the story that assures its success.

LIQUID AIR (May 2).—In one of the experiments in this film, two eels are placed in a tank of liquid air. When taken out they are frozen solid. One of them when placed in water comes to life, but, with a hammer, the other is easily broken into small pieces. This is done to prove that liquid air merely suspends life for the time being. Together with other experiments, this demonstration has a message of interest to the masses who do not number a knowledge of scientific matters among their accomplishments.

On the same reel:

WINTER IN UPPER ENGADINE (Switzerland).—A view of the Alps in all their wondrous and glorious beauty, holding the spectator spellbound by its very magnificence.

GENERAL SCOTT'S PROTEGE (May 3).—When her lover's life is sacrificed to pay the penalty for a crime committed by the chief's son, Red Wing, an Indian maiden leaves the camp and goes to live with the family of General Scott, who is in charge of a frontier post. The Indians do not bother her while General Scott is alive, but when he dies and the funeral procession is journeying to the cemetery the red men demand the return of Red Wing. She refuses to go, whereupon the savages attempt to take her from the soldiers. In as pretty a fight as one would wish to see, they are defeated and the heroine of the battle is little Red Wing, General Scott's protege.

GREAT NORTHERN

WHO IS MOST TO BLAME (May 3).—Mr. Parson is a wealthy banker and his wife is one of the most fashionable women in her set. Mr. Donald is a solicitor and had been an ardent admirer of Mrs. Parson before her marriage. The latter attends a reception, while her husband hurries to attend a meeting of the board of directors of the bank in which he is interested. At the reception she meets Donald and, in a spirit of frivolity, invites him to her home, explaining to her hostess that she is suffering from headache. In the meantime, Jennie, the maid in the employ of the Parsons, has taken advantage of the absence of her employers to invite the butcher's assistant to tbe bouse. The two are feasting and the butcher's clerk is smoking expensive perfectos when Mrs. Parson rings for admittance. In the emergency the young man is hidden under a couch and Jennie hurriedly removes the remnants of the repast from the table. Soon after the arrival of Mrs. Parson, she receives the promised visit from Donald and the two are chatting amiably when Mr. Parson proceeds to let himself into the house. The fact is that after the meeting of the bank directors, the staid financiers visit a music hall and then engage in a friendly game of cards at the club. Parson becomes weary of the entertainment at the club and decides to hurry to his home. Before he enters his wife secretes Donald under the same couch under which the butcher's clerk is hidden. The solicitor and the former meet for the first time under these awkward circumstances and all goes well until Mr. Parson discovers two empty glasses on the mantel. The maid arrives in time and explains that the mistress and herself had taken a little "nightcap." Then the banker finds the stub of a cigar which the butcher's helper had been smoking and once again his suspicions are aroused. Sounds of breathing from beneath the couch cause him to investigate and the serving maid's sweetheart is pulled from cover by the ear. Again Jennie comes to the rescue and removes an embarrassing situation by admitting that she had been entertaining her sweetheart during the absence of the family. Donald escapes unseen, and on the day following he receives a visit from the butcher's apprentice. They laugh heartily over the strange predicament in which they found themselves on the previous night and all ends merrily.

THEIR LIVES BY A THREAD.—Across the sun-baked plains of the great Southwest a prairie schooner crawls along, half hidden in a cloud of choking dust. It halts. The trailing riders draw alongside and with reverent hands lift a limp figure to the ground. With pick and shovel they dig a shallow grave and lower their comrade to his final resting place. Then the home-seekers ride on—an and on to the Land of Promise at the end of the rainbow.

Years pass. The day of the prairie is no more. It has given way to the shining bands of steel that link this fertile country with the centers of civilization. Land has taken on a value and is eagerly sought after by real estate dealers. To this locality comes William Barnes with his wife and baby daughter. Formerly possessed of wealth and accustomed to living in luxury, Mrs. Barnes cannot reconcile herself to the new life. Her aristocratic temperament suffers as she pictures herself the wife of a construction company foreman. Driven almost to desperation by his wife, Barnes pours over his private papers representing the epoch of bis past life, when investments had failed and poverty had overtaken him. He finds his insurance policy for $100,000.00 and is immediately struck with the thought of obtaining this money by fraud.

Aided and abetted by his wife, Barnes plots to murder Karl, one of bis workmen, and leave the body in such a condition that it will be adjudged his own when the coroner empanels his jury. It will be a simple matter for him to remain in retirement and send his supposed widow to cash the policy. Then, with the money in their possession, the family will flee to Mexico and begin life anew.

He leaves his humble home and goes directly to the construction camp. Summoning Karl, he instructs him to look after the office until his return. In order to carry out bis fiendish plan, Barnes determines to destroy the building with dynamite, calculating that the explosion will practically blot out any of Karl's recognizable features. He enters tbe pit where the dynamite is stored, obtains a supply and plants it with a long-time fuse attached directly behind the time-keeper's office. He then returns to his home to await the explosion. Apparently no power on earth can save Karl from bis fate. But wait! His favorite Eskimo dog playfully bounding across a pile of lumber has pulled down some of tbe heavy beams across his paws. A few seconds before the fuse has burnt to its end, Karl comes to the window of the office, sees bis friend and companion in distress and leaps out of the window and across tbe intervening space just as tbe shack is blown to atoms. As the detonation reaches the ears of Barnes, his wife seizes a shawl and rushes out of the house towards the smoking ruins. Brushing everybody aside, she tragically declares that her husband has been killed in the explosion. A jury is hastily impanelled to begin their investigation into the accident. The explosion has unearthed the buried settler's body, which the jury believes to be the remains of Barnes, and which Mrs. Barnes thinks is the body of Karl.

Keeping in retirement, Barnes sends his wife to the city to cash the insurance policy. Sbe is received by the president of the company and presented with the money.

Gathering their few belongings togetber, the Barnes family steal away at night and escape to Mexico. Meantime, Karl receives a letter from his uncle, president of the insurance company that has cashed Barnes' policy, enclosing funds for him to make the journey to the city to accept a responsible position as a representative of the insurance company.

An interval of time passes. Karl, now grown to mature manhood, has succeeded bis uncle as president of the Bankers' International Life Insurance Co. In Mexico, Barnes has prospered under the assumed name of Robert Campbell, and is financially interested as superintendent of a large Mexican construction company. His daughter, Martha, has grown to beautiful womanhood and is secretly admired by Jose, a wealthy Mexican land-owner. Within the construction camp trouble is brewing. Anita, a beautiful Mexican girl, craves beautiful clothes and bits of finery that she has never known in her poor life. She persuades her lover, Pedro, to organize a demonstration of the workmen and demand for tbem increased wages. Just about this time Karl leaves his northern bome and comes to Mexico for his vacation. He meets Martha and Jose, who has proposed and been rejected. He is invited to attend a reception given at Martha's home that evening. During the day the strikers, headed by Pedro, have asked and been refused their demands for increased wages. Barnes, now masquerading under the name of Campbell, throws aside his business cares and enters into the spirit of this function given by his daughter. He is introduced to Karl, and instant recognition takes place between them. The shock is great, but both recover and the festivities go on.

The next day, however, Karl calls upon Campbell at his office near the great dam and openly accuses him of having defrauded his uncle's company, of which he, Karl, is now the president. During their talk the strikers, falsely informed by Jose, Martha's admirer and jealous of Karl, that Karl is about to bring men to the camp to supplant them, rush into the office. When their demands are again refused they choke Campbell into insensibility and lead Karl to the edge of the excavation work. Here a terrific struggle ensues, but overpowered three to one, Karl is pushed over the edge and falls to the bottom of the cut insensible. Martha, who has been talking to her father over the telephone, realizes as she hears the struggle in the office that something terrible has happened. She orders her automobile and is driven at breakneck speed to the construction camp. Horrified upon finding her father apparently lifeless, she looks about for aid. Anita, who has been an observer of all that has taken place, reluctantly consents to assist in reviving her father. During the struggle in the office Karl's coat has been torn from him by tbe strikers and when Martha discovers it lying upon tbe floor she knows at once that he has met witb foul play. Leaving her father, she runs to tbe edge of the cliff and, leaning far over, sbe can see Karl lying at the bottom of tbe pit. There is but one way to rescue him, and she bravely decides to take tbe risk. With Anita's help the huge ore-bucket used in conveying materials to the workmen on tbe dam is made ready. Martha clambers inside and is lifted to an elevation of five hundred feet above the ground. Then out across the valley she rides, her life depending upon a single slender cable. When directly over the spot where Karl has been thrown, she waves her hand and Anita, at the throttle, lowers tbe cage from its dizzy elevation. Down, down, down she goes, until below the surface of the ground. At last the bucket rests on terra firma in a pool of slime. She revives Karl, assists him into the bucket and gives the signal to be hoisted. Again they are raised to a great height and drawn back to safety. Overjoyed at the safe return of his daughter, Barnes alias Campbell, is moved to declare an immediate increase of the strikers' wages as a fitting reward to Anita for her heroic part in running the hoisting engine. He also makes good the full amount of his insurance policy to Karl, and all ends happily as Martha gives herself to the man she has learned to love.

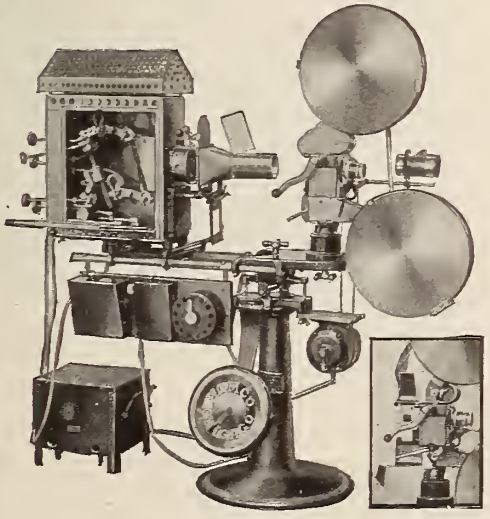
MACHINE



The Owners' Stand-By

EVEN A GOOD OPERATOR can ruin a good film UNLESS HE is given a machine that will protect the film in its entire passage from reel to reel. NO MACHINE offers this protection to the film, so strongly, as does THE MOTIOGRAPH.

ON THE MOTIOGRAPH the film is guided over the film sprockets by A FLANGED IDLER ROLLER (Patented and Controlled by us) which touches only the outside edge of the film. AT NO TIME can the emulsion surface of the film come in contact with any metal part.

Do You Know the Motiograph?
Does Your Operator Know It?

Unless you are both familiar with this machine you are not only NOT UP-TO-DATE, but, you are doing injustice to yourselves, to your patrons who are paying for good projection but also to us, the manufacturer who has spent thousands upon thousands of dollars in yearly improvements to furnish you with a "QUALITY MACHINE" where an exchange of dollars brings you an equal amount of value.

THE LOBBY

By Mr. S. J. Newman, Secretary and Treasurer of The Newman Manufacturing Company

The thousands of Moving Picture News readers probably have begun to think that I have forgotten about them, inasmuch as I have not contributed an article for some time. However, I assure you it has been through no fault of mine. The flood was the reason. To begin with, my wife and sister, who were visiting my wife's folks, were rescued in boats in Dayton, Ohio, during the flood. I lost more than a week's time (and about six pounds avoirdupois) trying to locate them. Finally found them marooned about six miles out in the country with some kind farmer and family. Then along came the almost unprecedented swelling of the waters of the Ohio River, crippling all railroads, and temporarily wiping this old town, Cincinnati, off the map. Result: No shipments or mail could come in or go out, and things in general were greatly demoralized. Boys, I want to remark right now that the waters played havoc with nearly every theatre in the flooded territory in Ohio and Indiana. Hardly a house escaped damage. The man of the hour was John H. Patterson, president of the National Cash Register Co. He and his co-workers were a blessing to Dayton's flood sufferers. I could write a book recounting what I saw. An amusing incident of the Dayton flood was the sight of a mule standing on the flat top roof of a hut floating down the river. He was taking it as nonchalantly as if he were on dry land standing between two shafts, but he was doomed, for 200 yards ahead of him loomed up a most formidable looking concrete bridge just two feet above the water, and the water was rushing the mule onward at a most terrific pace. Nothing to warn the mule—poor thing—then a crash head on—mule sank into the swirling waters—the hut dashed into a lot of planks and splinters.

This reminded me so much of an Iowa exhibitor in a small town of 5,000 population. He had the only theatre in town and was doing a pretty fair business. When I approached him about two years ago to induce him to make an attractive lobby display with brass frames and easels, he simply smiled and said that he didn't have to make any display as he had no competition. My many arguments were of no avail. He took things as nonchalantly as the "mule," but he was speeding onward to his doom just as surely as did the mule, and with his eyes shut, so to speak. About a year later an enterprising man looking for a good town to open a theatre dropped into this town, and it only took him a few hours to find out that he could make a gold mine out of a theatre by opening up a first-class house, treating his patrons courteously, show good pictures, and last, but not least, make an attractive lobby display. He obtained a lease of a building which was remodeled and converted into a first-class theatre, and he put in six combination brass easel poster frames, as per accompanying illustration, and one interchangeable tile letter announcement frame to announce his program of to-day and program coming. He did everything in the right way, was enterprising, and his opening was a huge success. The other exhibitor's attendance fell off woefully, but when it was too late he tried to improve his theatre, with the consequence that he closed up inside of six months. I understand that he is ticket taker at the other theatre. Poor fellow!

Philadelphia, Pa.—J. P. Cassidy, of Cape May, has been awarded the contract for an open air moving picture theatre, for the Marine Park Amusement Company of Cape May.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC., LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—John Rickards.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.
Assistant Business Representative—John Rickards.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 619
Office—133 Third Avenue.

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, was well represented at the Screen Club hall, held last Saturday night at Terrace Garden, New York. The delegation to represent the union were President Robert Goldblatt, Business Representative Ralph J. Knaster, Secretary John Rickards, B. A. Freedman and many others. The first hall of the Screen Club was one great success, and the boys had one big time also making many new acquaintances.

Preparations were made for the coming ball of the M. P. M. O. U., Local No. 1, of Greater New York, which will be held next winter, and the place for the big event will be either Madison Square Garden or the New Grand Central Palace. It is anticipated that this coming event will be the greatest of any affair ever held by any picture operators union in this country.

The M. P. O. Union, No. 1, held their last regular meeting Monday, April 21, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street. There was quite a large attendance. Six new members were obligated and eight applications were read off. It is evident that many operators are taking advantage of the $5.00 initiation fee now in force, which will last for another six weeks, and then the entrance fee will be $50.00. The question of sick benefit was taken up again and was laid over until after the convention. Brother John Rickards was elected recording secretary by a unanimous standing vote in place of Brother George Epstein, who had to give up the position on account of other business taking up all of his spare time. The boys were sorry to see Brother Epstein resign from the secretaryship as he had done some grand work for the organization.

Brother John Rickards is capable of doing some good work, and has proved it as secretary-treasurer of the last ball committee.

Business at the office is excellent, and the organization is progressing so wonderfully that we were compelled to elect an assistant business representative to lighten the heavy work of Brother Ralph Knaster. All the members are working and we were compelled to send exhibitors away from the office without supplying them operators.

Brother Rickards, now assistant business agent, was compelled to refuse all telephone calls which came in for operators this last week. The obligation of new members at the last meeting will relieve the situation somewhat at least for the time being. I advise all operators not employed to call at our office and make application for membership. There is no need of going idle, we have plenty of work to hand out to good operators. Take advantage now of the $5.00 fee, for you will never get this chance again. The next meeting of the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, Local No. 1, of Greater New York, will be held May 5, 1913, at the regular meeting rooms. Nominations for delegate to attend the Seattle convention and other very important business will be taken up. A full attendance is requested.

A trip to Coney Island last Sunday proved that business is not brisk there at present. The projection at the various dance halls and hotels was not up to the mark. I visited the Mardi Gras and walked to the operating booth and had a chat with the operator, who does not belong to any organization, but promised to join the boys of Local No. 1. The projection there was fair considering the distance to the picture screen. I visited Weisberger's Hotel, on Surf avenue, near Eighth street, Coney Island, and sat down at one of the tables, not being noticed. The projection at this place was the best I have seen for quite some time. I inquired for Mr. Weisberger and was directed to the front of the pavilion, there to meet one of Coney Island's brightest exhibitors of motion pictures. Mr. Weisberger greeted me in a most manly way and invited me to his private office. I then told him what I thought of the projection I witnessed at his hotel, and praised his operators, also asking him who they were and where he secured them. He laughed a hearty laugh, showing his well-kept teeth, and, as he was wearing eyeglasses, put me in thought of Colonel Roosevelt. "Well," said he, "I don't make a practice of praising people, but those operators (meaning two men in the booth) employed here are the best in this city, and don't feel big because I tell you this; they may get word of it and may get independent. They belong to Local No. 1 of M. P. M. O. U." When I heard this my whole soul lit up with joy. I immediately went to the booth and saw Brother Chas. Hardell at the machine, and Brother Tillman placing carbons in the lamp house of the second machine. I told them what Mr. Weisberger said, and asked them to keep up the good work. At Dicker's Hotel I visited the booth to find Otto Klein operating the machine. Though he is a member of the new branch of Local No. 35, nothing can be said against his projection. He had a very good light and a clear picture, and I was not backward to let him know, regardless of organization matters, that I was pretty sure ... Local No. 35 has very few like him.

Don't forget the headquarters of Local No. 1.

Fall in line with the real operators and place your application for membership.

RALPH KNASTER,
Business Representative.

Office 133 Third avenue, New York.

"THE BROTHERS"
(Release Monday, May 5, 1913)
A Western of genuine worth. Two brothers, opposites in nature, meet a woman. The parting of the ways then commences.

"HUMAN KINDNESS"
(Release Thursday, May 8, 1913)
A heartless head gardener finds the aged gardener too old. He is replaced by a younger man—his staff of life is removed until a kindly neighboring Miss enters the story.

"YOUTH AND JEALOUSY"
When you were courtin' Sally maybe some fresh young feller tried to hust it up! Sends anonymous notes to her and all that! Well, that's what a jealous suitor tried—but love itself hranded it a failure and himself a fraud. A splendid story. You will want it.

TO THEATRES:—Handsome lithos of those popular "Flying A" favorites, Jack Kerrigan, Pauline Bush and Jack Richardson. Best of business pullers for lohby display. Ask your exchange.

OPERATORS' BANQUET

The first banquet and entertainment of the Moving Picture and Projecting Machine Operators' Union, Local No. 160, of Cleveland, O., is now history. Judging by the compliments received from friends who attended, the evening of April 16, 1913, will long be remembered. Vaudeville performers entertained the guests while the "eats" were served. Thanhouser Kid and her sister were there and received a warm welcome. Those who see them on the screen appreciated their act and expressed their delight of an opportunity to see them in person, and understand why the "Kid" is popular as a child actor. Several guests responded to requests of the toastmaster, including prominent labor men of the city and state federations. The toastmaster bid the guests good night and godspeed at 2:10 a. m.

Philadelphia, Pa.—M. Shore has contract for moving picture theatre on Woodland avenue, west of Fifty-eighth street, to cost $27,000, for Wolf Bodek. B. A. Rehill is the architect.

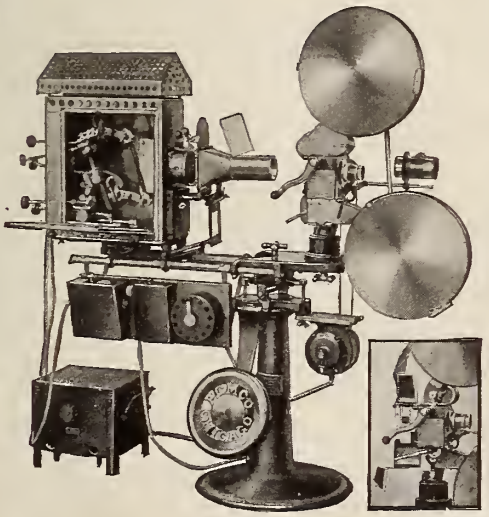
FOR MOTIOGRAPH SUPREMACY

You Know



SOMETHING MAKES THE MOTIOGRAPH DIFFERENT—WHAT IS IT?

All machine specifications read much alike, yet YOU KNOW all machines are not alike in the service they give extending over a period of years. There lies the difference, plus—the way the MOTIOGRAPH makers DO things. IT IS STANDARD. The MOTIOGRAPH standard has always been simply this: Make every part of the machine the best, buy only the best material; make it the right way; put it together with skilled labor; test it with utmost care, and then sell this product in a standard high-class way. THIS HIGH MOTIOGRAPH STANDARD IS EXPENSIVE, YET, WE THINK, MERELY GOOD BUSINESS POLICY. It has established the reputation of the MOTIOGRAPH. We are proud of that reputation, and jealous of it, too.

WE INTEND TO MAINTAIN THE MOTIOGRAPH REPUTATION BY MAINTAINING OUR STANDARD.

WESTERN PICTURES

THE question was asked me by one of the exhibitors the other day, regarding my opinion of the Wild West pictures that are being so largely used nowadays, if I thought they were anyway true to life? My reply was emphatically No! They are as far from being true to life as it is possible for anything to be.

The old melodramatic plays created heroes that were never known in everyday life. The same with the moving picture, scenario writer, and producer. The farther away it is from true reality, the more exciting and blood-curdling the thoughts engendered by the picture are, the better the directors seem to like it, but the public are getting so satiated with this sort of food that they are turning in disgust against it.

I am only a naturalized American, but prior to, and since taking out my citizenship papers, I have had the highest respect for the frontiersmen who opened out the West civilization; the development of the West is an epoch in American history, and unless history lies, those were days of the true "pioneers," and "vikings" of America, when such hotchpotch as we see in the films was absolutely unknown. The cowboy then was one who attended to the cattle, and the rough life made a man of him, and yet an honest transcript of those early days is denied to the West either in literature or in the drama or in moving pictures.

In my conversations with literary men I have asked the question, Why? and have been invariably met with a shrug of the shoulders and an answer that distortion is the rule; everyone simply plays to the gallery. The consequence is that boys and girls who visit the motion picture theatre are being taught the rankest falsehoods regarding life in the West without the slightest regard to truth. The pioneers of the early days are lowered to the level of cowards, or raised to meet some perverted contention.

I was reading the other day Theodore Roosevelt's "Winning of the West," and I have looked in vain to find references to "Alkali Ike" or "Rattlesnake Pete," and such-like tommyrot. Not a single mention does he make throughout the whole book of any such individuals, and he ought to know. Turning over an old copy of the Evening Post I came across the following article, "The Imitation Bad Man," written by Emerson Hough: "Perhaps some day there may arise a publisher who will print a novel about a Westerner who is just a man; perhaps he may find an artist who can paint a picture depicting some Western character, and make him just a man. If this departure from the ancient and accepted foundry output shall prove profitable—as likely it will—the result will be the crowding out from his last lurking place of the 'Imitation Bad Man'; his only record then will remain on the gravestones of the big, sane, law-loving land west of the Missouri. The epitaph of the would-be desperado is that which comes to be written over all insincerity, 'Died of self-deception.' There is no poorer epitaph than that, and when I look round at some of the people who are deceiving themselves so grossly to-day, I wonder if those who are left from them will dare put such an epitaph on their gravestone."

The moving picture is the worst offender in this self-deception, and by watching the pictures I got the impression that the only tangible things the West ever possessed were swaggery men in sombreros, armed with six-shooters, which before they could draw out of the holster, they would be dead men, swathing their limbs in leather, wrist and abdomen swathed with semi-like armor; putting one in mind of the arenas of old in which the gladiators held forth.

Talking with an old cattle rancher, whom I took to see one of these Wild West pictures, he said it made his blood boil, and he would like that photographer in his clutches to give him a bastinado first, then show him what real Western life is like. He said that the pistol barrel of the picture cowboy was such that it was two inches longer than it ought to be, and before the picturesque pistols could be pulled out of the halter a Texan Rancher wearing his belt properly would be able to shoot every man shown in the picture. This is a hint for directors.

Bringing this to the attention of manufacturers they said that they were simply giving the public what it wants. The answer is not at all convincing because while the exchanges and the exhibitors may be compelled to use these films, not having anything better to show, the public often grumble in a pretty loud manner, and such pictures are only an insult to intelligent audiences, and in this instance the picture makers try to make water run uphill.

The public is easily humbugged—I have found out long ere this—and it is only a false promise to say that it insists upon being humbugged and grossly perverted.

I would like to see a true Western picture of the highest class, that will be a real lesson in Wild Western ranch life, showing the cattle herding, and the sheep in their native haunts, and the cowboys doing their best to keep them from straying, and as my friend told me, in all his experience of twenty-five years on the ranch, he never in one instance saw a sombrero such as is worn by the actors today, anywhere on his ranch, and he had something like 200 cowboys to take care of at once. If it were only possible to show the games, the sports, and the fun that they indulged in, it would be giving the poor citizens a real taste of the breezes from the Wild and Woolly West, in a sylvan scene, and not teaching them that all the West is a crime centre.

Will some of the directors please take note, and order their pictures accordingly, then try to get some of the scenario writers to write a real pastoral Western story, they will then receive the thanks not only of my readers but of

Alfred H. Saunders.

'Frisco will get an advance view of the Panama Canal in natural colors at the Columbia Theatre on July 6th, the first Pacific Coast company opening at the Valentine Theatre, Toledo, and traveling westward by easy stages with stops at Omaha, Denver and Salt Lake City. This pictorial advance agent of the Exposition will remain in San Francisco and surrounding territory. About the same time a North Coast company will open at Seattle, and a little later another company will be sent on tour of British Columbia. As an interesting war feature, the Coast companies will show some films depicting the maneuvres of the Japanese army.

OPTICAL GLASS

The Auditorium, Saginaw, Mich.

Alfred H. Saunders,
New York City.

Dear Sir:—In the February 15th edition of the Moving Picture News you referred to the use of optical glass for moving picture booths, and it appeared to be a very practical and wise suggestion. We are about building such a booth in our auditorium and desire it complete in every respect. I have interviewed our hardware men here and also the Saginaw Plate Glass Company of this city, which manufactures a fine quality of plate glass. None of those interviewed appeared to know what "Optical Glass" is, or where it can be procured. If you will kindly supply me with the information giving name and address of parties manufacturing or supplying it, you will place under obligation,

Very truly yours.
FRED P. WALTER.

Mr. Fred P. Walter,
Saginaw, Mich.

Dear Sir:—In reply to yours of March 31st I beg to state that optical glass is a term largely used in England for very clear plate glass, glass perfectly white without a flaw or striae. Many of the glass works in England make this, notably Chance's of Birmingham.

Greater care seems to be taken in England with the glass than is in America, although I believe much good work is done here; however, any piece of clear white plate glass will answer the purpose of optical glass. If there are lines or bubbles in the glass the rays of the picture are diverted and magnified on the screen.

Trusting this answers your purpose.

Yours faithfully,
ALFRED H. SAUNDERS.

The above correspondence will help other readers.—Ed. M. P. N.

KENTUCKY CONVENTION

Kentucky State Branch Number Eight, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, met in convention at the Seelbach Hotel, Louisville, Ky., on Wednesday, April 23rd. 1913. A large number of exhibitors attended; new members were taken in, and a rousing, enthusiastic convention was held. After remarks by several of the members, the convention got right down to business. After the report of the committees on credentials, auditing, resolutions, legislative and grievances, the books were found to balance and every situation was met and future business provided for, checks drawn to the National League for per capita tax, and a general discussion of matters—the following officers were elected: National vice president, Orene Parker, Covington, Ky.; president, L. J. Dittmar, Louisville, Ky.; first vice president, J. A. Bleich, Owensburg, Ky.; second vice president, J. J. Ciarlo, Newport, Ky.; secretary, J. J. Dolle, Louisville, Ky.; treasurer, Max L. Simon, Louisville, Ky.

The delegates and alternates to the New York convention in July are as follows: L. H. Ramsey, A. B. Arnett, L. J. Dittmar, J. J. Cravlo, H. B. Strulie, Carl Tarvin; G. A. Bleich, C. Bloomfield, J. M. Wentzell, Jos. L. Steurle, Mr. Griffith, Fred Dolle.

Just after the officers were elected, President Neff arrived via L. & N. and was escorted to the convention hall, where he addressed the convention. President Neff in his remarks called the attention of the exhibitors to conditions existing now as compared with former conditions a year or more ago. He pointed out the necessity of organizing and co-operation of all those interested in the motion picture business, especially dwelling on the importance of uplifting the business and creating a healthy public sentiment in favor of the motion picture; he expressed the opinion that he believed that the motion picture was the greatest potential factor in the lives of the human race in education, amusement and the molding of a public sentiment, but at all times made plain the necessity of using the screen for the cause of righteousness. One of the things that he mentioned was that all cigarette smoking by female performers should be positively eliminated and that no pictures should be shown to the public where girls or women used the cigarette in the motion picture; he stated that it had a tendency to demoralize, owing to the large number of young girls and boys attending the motion picture theatres; he stated it would certainly not elevate the industry but would cause the enemies to condemn it. If the manufacturers and more especially the directors of the studios would eliminate the practice of allowing cigarette smoking by motion picture actresses in the pictures, it would prove beneficial to the uplift of the business. "It is offensive enough for girls and women to smoke in private without displaying this vulgar practice in public through the motion picture." While President Neff did not condemn the directors for this practice, yet he made it clear that it was possible for the directors to eliminate it.

After the meeting adjourned the banquet was served in the grill room of the Seelbach Hotel, where the sweet strains of music cheered the exhibitors on as they partook of the hospitality of the Louisville Committee on Arrangements. During the banquet, Mr. Neff stirred the exhibitors to a high stage of enthusiasm on the big convention which will take place in New York beginning July 7th. Old Kentucky will be there well represented, with banners flying.

After the banquet, the exhibitors in a body visited President Dittmar's beautiful Majestic Theatre—one of the finest throughout the country. At 8:10 they visited the Keith's Vaudeville House and were entertained by a splendid performance. After the show was over they again visited the Seelbach, where a splendid spread awaited them.

In the wee small hours of the night, the taxis were busy taking the exhibitors to the trains, where the most of them took a Pullman sleeper for their homes.

The Texas State Convention will be held in Dallas, Texas, on the 28th and 29th of May. A large attendance is expected. National Vice-President Finnegan of Dallas will have full charge of convention arrangements; as he made such a grand success of their last convention, it goes without saying that the Dallas Convention to be held on the 28th and 29th of May will be one of the largest yet held in the South.

A convention is called for Tennessee on the 17th of May. President Neff has just sent an organizer into Tennessee to visit all the exhibitors there.

The Baltimore, Md., and Wilmington, Del., conventions are being handled by experienced, enthusiastic workers.

The big convention to be held in Philadelphia no doubt will be a HUMMER!

Mr. Neff left Cincinnati Monday night via Big Four to meet the West Virginia boys.

The committee appointed to distribute the funds gathered for the flood sufferers are as follows: M. A. Neff, Cincinnati; J. J. Reider, Jackson, Mich.; F. J. Rembusch, Shelbyville, Ind.; Alfred H. Saunders, Editor, Moving Picture News, New York; Jas. Hoff, Editor, Moving Picture World, New York; Ed. J. Mock, Motography; J. H. Mayer, Editor, Bill Board Cincinnati, Ohio.

EXPOSITION PROGRESS

General, Mutual and Universal Companies Each Take Theatre

Three of the "Model Theatres" on the mezzanine floor of the New Grand Central Palace have been rented by the three largest film combinations in America. For some time it has been assured that these manufacturers would each take a theatre, but the final plans were not arranged until the first part of this week. These three companies will also be represented on the main floor of the Palace. They are planning most attractive booths in which their favorite players will hold receptions every afternoon and evening.

So far as the theatres are concerned they are progressing nicely. Ever since Mr. Samuels has returned from London he has devoted most of his time to perfecting the plans of these theatres and now the work of building them will commence so that they will be all ready by the first of July.

The fronts will be designed and built by the Acme Metal Ceiling Company.

The American Seating Company will install their highest grade leather and plush chairs, so that they will be most comfortable.

To make them absolutely safe the Johns-Manville Company will erect asbestos booths to house the different projecting machines.

The Electrene Fire-Extinguishers will be used around the theatres.

The Powers, Simplex, Standard, Motiograph and Edison machines will be used in the booths.

The pictures will be thrown on the Mirroroide or the Day and Night Screens.

Different electrical companies will install cooling and ventilating systems.

The Lang Rewinders will be used in the projecting booths.

Music will be furnished for each theatre by some effect machine or piano.

The Photo-Player and the Oshkosh effects will be much in evidence.

Slides will be used announcing the different pictures, which will be furnished by the Novelty Slide Company, the Manhattan Slide Company, and Scott & Van Altena.

The Masten Decorating Company are to be the official decorators of the Exposition and will receive the co-operation of the committee. Some of the plans designed by them are very attractive. Within the next week diagrams of the booths showing rails, backs, signs, etc., to be furnished free by the International Exposition Company will be sent to all those who have taken space.

The Convention Committee appointed by President Trigger are holding meetings daily and plans to entertain the delegates and so forth who will attend the Convention are being arranged.

Several have already sent in scenarios for the prize of $25.00 offered by the Exposition Committee for the best scenario of a five minute act suitable for either a man or a woman. None of them, however, are quite what the committee want. This competition will not close until the first of June, so those desirous of competing may send their manuscripts to Frank E. Samuels, Secretary of the First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, second floor of the German Bank Building, Fourth avenue and Fourteenth street, New York City.

PENNSYLVANIA SECOND ANNUAL STATE CONVENTION

Until a short time ago the name of Philadelphia was synonymous of somnambulism. It is most gratifying to note the many ways in which this quaint old city, has not only taken hold, but is now running close on par with the most progressive cities of the world. This fact is well evidenced by the way those interested in the motion picture industry and art have displayed their enthusiasm over the coming Second Annual State Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, which is to be held in Philadelphia on the 27th and the 28th day of May, at the Continental Hotel.

On last Wednesday Messrs. Kerr, Walraven and Roth, of the convention committee were the guests of Mr. S. Lubin at luncheon at the Lubin plant, together with many of the Lubin producers and artists. Mr. Lubin showed great enthusiasm in regard to the coming convention, and will detail a number of his camera men to make a reel of film for the Exhibitors' League, under the guidance of the League convention committee, depicting the historic points of interest in and around Philadelphia. Also showing many of the various commercial industries together with the civic development of the city, as well as taking a picture of all the Exhibitors and their families. These pictures will be displayed in every civilized corner of the world, and strange as it may seem, this will be the first complete motion picture ever made showing the many points of interest in the city, which is looked on throughout the entire world as the birthplace of modern civilization.

Elaborate arrangements will be made by Mr. Lubin to entertain the many out of town Exhibitors and their families, who will wish to visit, not only the Lubin plant in Philadelphia, but the new $2,000,000 plant, which is nearing completion at historic Betzwood, outside of Philadelphia. Words are inadequate to describe this plant, as it covers over 500 acres of ground, laid out in parks, cattle ranges, mountains, etc., beside containing a mammoth studio with many stages, together with scores of other buildings for the manufacturing of the "Clear as Bell" films.

Oscar C. Apfel, as a typical director, gave me the following terse statement:

"Left on Hamburg-American steamer Victoria Luise. Two days in Havana. Very romantic, moonlight, senoritas, mantillas, mandolins, etc. Queer narrow streets. Historic Morro Castle and Cabanas fort. Awful record of cruelties by the Spaniards. Also good cigars and several new drinks.

Colon—Atlantic entrance to canal. Much hustle. Trip through canal. Gatun Locks—Gatun Lake—Culebra Cut with the landslides—to Panama.

Panama—Very old and interesting—churches, theatres, etc. Also more new drinks.

Then Kingston and Jamaica. Beautiful harbor. Negroes gather and dive for coins. Scenery is gorgeous Wonderful drives up Rio Cobra Cañon to Bog Walk. Beautiful botanical gardens with every known variety of tropical plant at Castleton Gardens and Hope Gardens. The roads are the motorists' paradise and kept up by the government.

Many ruins of the earthquake in Kingston. Outside of Kingston you see very few whites—nothing but negroes and children by the million, with a calico slip on—sometimes.

Banana groves of vast extent like our great corn fields of our Middle West. Also more new drinks.

Return trip marred by sailor falling overboard and eaten by sharks.

Life on boat delightful—dances, games, tournaments, etc.

BILL HEDWIG A FATHER

The first release of Mr. and Mrs. William Hedwig occurred April twenty-seventh. The title is Gordon Wilbur. Bill Hedwig, the popular and well-known superintendent of the Imp laboratory, smiled all over when he heard the news, and forgot all about film and prints and such unimportant details. "It's a boy," spoken with indescribable emphasis, seemed to be the total of his vocabulary. And what's more, it's a big, husky boy.

When interviewed, Mr. Hedwig said:

"I wouldn't take a million dollars for it, and I wouldn't give a dime for another."

AN INTERVIEW WITH MISS JENNETTE COHEN, OF MINER COMPANY

Meeting Miss Cohen in the business world and learning of her success I asked her for a short resume of her introduction into the M. P. Poster work, to which she responded by saying:

Some are born great, some achieve greatness and some have greatness thrust upon them. I was not born rich, nor have I achieved greatness, but apparently I am to have greatness thrust upon me.

Now just what is expected of me that you and others might not be disillusioned? The safest plan I think is to bask in the sunshine that reflects the high standing of the organization I represent. The officers are: Asa R. Cassidy, president; Walter J. Moore, vice-president; Hugo Zeigfeld, vice-president; Thomas A. O'Brien, secretary and treasurer, with business address, 342 West Fourteenth street. They advertise that they are the best equipped theatrical poster printing house in the world.

Mr. Asa Cassidy and Mr. Hugo Ziegfeld are two well-known and famous artists, and considered authority on poster effects. They are the highest salaried men in the business.

I am often asked why the Miner Company never solicited the moving picture business before. It is easily explained—they felt that their organization was such that they could produce only one character of work—the very best—and that the thought was how cheap can I buy paper instead of who can I get to handle the poster to best illustrate my subject from an advertising as well as artistic standpoint, but that now there was a demand for better paper inasmuch as the exhibitor feels that he must compete with the opera houses and has to depend largely on the paper displayed to fill their houses, and I find that the majority of the manufacturers also feel the need of better paper in keeping with the elaborate features being produced at the present time.

The H. C. Miner Co. needs no introduction to the moving picture industry, nor will it need further recommendation than to refer to paper produced for the A. H. Wood's "Miracle," "Jack London's Adventures in the South Sea Islands," "Robinson Crusoe" for the Universal Film Company, "In the Sultan's Power" for the World's Best Film Company, "The Big Boss" for the Reliance, Thanhouser and others. Tell me a little about yourself, will you please?

A few words about myself? I always longed for an opportunity to do things out of the ordinary—things different than others were doing, and after visiting New York for several months realized that at last opportunity was knocking at my door and the time had come to act. I don't think one can be a drone very long in New York, this wonderful city of sudden success and precipitate failure, of opportunities and disillusionment, and I was determined that I would be counted a Southern New York success, and though I have not reached the pinnacle I feel at least my efforts have been partially crowned.

What was your idea of entering the advertising field?

When I thought of entering the advertising field it was my idea to lean toward "ad" writing, but I somehow drifted into the selling end, and am sure now that it is my forte.

It is intensely interesting, always something new. Keen competition ever stirring one on to renewed efforts. I would rather have a customer pleased. It means more to me and affords me more genuine pleasure than to go to a good show—and that's saying a great deal—inasmuch as I consider the theatre my principal diversion and recreation. After leaving school I finished a bookkeeping, stenography, and general commercial course, but I don't like amanuensis work—due, I dare say, to my obstreperous nature that revolted at being "dictated" to.

I had been selling advertising (you note I resent being called a "solicitor") for about a year, and I was asked by a party why I did not try to get some of the moving picture work. Mentioning the amount of heralds he used a month and incidentally stating they used about the same amount of posters a week I laughed and replied, "I don't want your heralds, I want your poster work." He said, "Well, I am afraid you won't be able to do that as the field is limited and every one is well represented." I asked him to hold off placing his order, to give me a chance, and I finally wound up at the H. C. Miner Company. They agreed to handle the account for me—but I did not get the order. I went back though and suggested that they permit me to establish this new department, and the proposition was made at a psychological moment as Mr. Cassidy had just returned from a Southern trip, and found a crying need for better posters (among the exhibitors), and so it was agreed that I try it out. The first order I got was for Robinson Crusoe, from the Universal Company. The one sheet is my particular pet poster, and I usually refer to it as MY blessing (in disguise), as it launched me upon my sea of "hopes attained."

How about your advertising project?

I have about decided to give up my general advertising and devote my entire time to the moving picture posters and heralds—and I think I'll have about all I can manage. It has now passed the experimental stage. The most pretentious herald contract was with the Warner Features, 700,000 heralds weekly.

It has been my good fortune to create my positions, and it is far more gratifying inasmuch as my efforts are crowned with success. I did not want anyone to say "she succeeded because I helped her." I started out with the determination to accomplish things myself.

About every other person I call on says, "You are not a New Yorker." I laugh and say, "My, no, I was born and bred in the Cotton Patch." My home is Memphis, Tenn.

Miss Cohen is a typical Southern lady and I wish her success ad lib.

COLOR IN PHOTOGRAPHY

The Photography of the Future—Natural Color Discovered for the First Time

By F. W. Hochstetter

For a proper realization of the astounding advance made in natural color photography in the art of the camera, it must be clearly emphasized that the colors are due to light and certain chemical formulas absolutely. No painting, handwork, stencil-work or similar devices are used. Photographers have known from time immemorial that the different colors made themselves known in any photographic plate in different gradation of a bluish gray appearance. These values have always lain latent in the plate, and time, money and experimentation has been going on for years with the purpose of realizing them on positive film or paper. The manufacturers of photographic papers and films have large forces of chemists constantly experimenting with the hope of achieving this philosopher's stone of photography. They have made orthochromatic plates and panchromatic plates and have succeeded in accentuating the gray gradation of color. The Lumiere Company of Lyons, France, have succeeded in making a plate whereby with colored particles of starch, it is possible with a time exposure to obtain color negatives. The Natural Color Company of London, by means of Panchromatic films and colored screens and by increasing or doubling the optic possibilities, have succeeded in making by means of red and green screens, a color illusion which has been called Kinemacolor.

The inventors, Messrs. Urban and Smith, have been very fair in their claim, as they announce in their literature that their results are obtained by means of a color filter wheel and persistence of vision on the part of the auditor. Admitting very frankly that probably the first man who, although he did not know it, discovered Kinemacolor, was Sir John Herschel, who demonstrated by spinning a coin that it was possible to see heads and tails at the same time.

Freeze, Green and Ives have made some interesting experiments in the production of colors by the use of belts and filters. These, however, cannot by any means be termed color photography, as the colors in the film, as stated above, are merely a more accentuated bluish gray and any colors possessed are obtained by means of outside agencies of color belts, filter wheels or screens of some kind or quality. Up to the coming of the Hochstetter (Expm) Process, no one had succeeded in putting the colors into actual visibility in the film appearing to the naked eye the same as at the moment of projection. All other means of obtaining color outside of these mentioned, have been found to be obsolete and impractical and not even capable of conveying an illusion effect in colors. It is true, by the older methods, that colored moving pictures could be obtained and are still obtained, but only by the costly process of employing numerous persons to paint the pictures, a process often taking months in the case of long reels. Even by this costly and slow process, only certain classes of subects are capable of being dealt with. Under the Hochstetter (Expm) Process, the colors of nature are photographically recorded simultaneously with the taking of the picture. The completed picture with all its glowing radiance of color can be exhibited and duplicates made as quickly as with black and white.

Another marvelous thing in this process and one that has been the "Pons Asinorum" of all photographic experimenters is the fact that they have not been able to make the red rays sensitive enough to work with the same rapidity as the other rays. According to the "Law and the Prophets" as laid down in the text books, and the so-called color experts, it is necessary to find a way of making red light work as fast as the other rays.

It has been an accepted fact that the photographic film known to commerce is not sensitive to red rays and only very slightly to yellow and green rays. For this reason a red light is used in dark rooms by which development of negatives is watched. Under the Hochstetter (Expm) Process the film used is the ordinary film of commerce used by photographers throughout the length and breadth of the civilized world, and this is treated by Mr. Hochstetter in a diametrically opposite manner to the ordinary amateur or professional photographer; and while susceptible of developments under any of the processes of the big photographic manufacturers, such as Eastman, Ansco, and others, in fact will develop and show better results than any of the ordinary developing processes that will develop a black and white plate. The improvement is so marked that even the most carping critic cannot doubt the result. Under the treatment of Mr. Hochstetter's, results can safely be said to be doubled and under his formula made to contain all the colors of the spectrum in their intrinsic values properly registered.

One of the great claims of the color experts is their ability to handle the red ray. According to them, in working out their process one of the most difficult problems is, that of making the photographic film sensitive to red light. They claim that in the making of a color sensitive film experiments covering a period of ten years have been made and that only of late they have been able to obtain a product which is sensitive to color waves in ordinary sun light from the brightest violets to the darkest reds. In the Hochstetter (Expm) Process the film is so sensitized that the ordinary professional is capable of handling it with the ease of an amateur with a kodak. It is not the intention here to give a description of the process that would necessitate scientific disquisition of a lengthy character, and it would scarcely be in place in this article, as the experiment was publicly given on December 13th and 18th at Carnegie Hall, New York, and at the Boston Academy of Music on January 1st.

For the present it is sufficient to say, that when Mr. Hochstetter is at work with his camera with the film prepared under his direction, there are no outside agencies of legerdemain of any kind used. When the film bearing these records is subsequently run through a motion picture machine or held to the light in front of the naked eye, the colors are seen absolutely in their naturalness exactly as they appear on the ground glass of a photographer's camera. It must be repeated that the process is so easy to set forth and its terms so simple that those unacquainted with the phenomena of light and color can immediately understand the scientific principles involved. Those doing so, will become so interested that they will readily acquaint themselves with the science of the subject by an excursion into the realms of physics, where such things are dealt with. The main point for consideration is, that in the practical working of the Hochstetter (Expm) Process, no scientific knowledge whatever is necessary. Any photographer who understands his business can readily take motion pictures in natural colors under this process: any man who knows the first principles of operating projecting machines is capable of running these pictures exactly as black and white pictures are run. With the coming of the Hochstetter (Expm) Process, a new era has dawned on the photographic world.

Not since the day Daguerre first put an image on a daguerreotype has there been any great improvement made in photography save along the stereotyped line of natural development.

Getting away from the "blazed trail," Mr. F. W. Hochstetter has pioneered into researches of the unknown and has come triumphantly from these fields with the following discoveries:

Plastic figures, stereoscopic effects with a single lens, luminous lights, meaning the throwing of light into shadows, revealing their density, and natural colors.

Appreciating that Mr. Hochstetter was heading in the right direction, Mr. Paul M. Pierson, of Ossining, New York, whose success in growing American Beauty roses has caused him to be known as America's foremost horticulturist, associated himself with Mr. Hochstetter in his early development. Encouraged by Mr. Pierson's stick-to-it-ive-ness, also by his business sagacity, Mr. Hochstetter and Mr. Pierson may jointly be said to have accomplished the most forward step in the photographic art during this century. Mr. Pierson came into the moving picture business with ideas as far advanced in the choice of subjects as were his ideas in the method of photography, and for that reason procuring the best talent that money could buy, he formed the Hochstetter-Pierson Company for the production of the Life of John Bunyan, and Pilgrim's Progress, in the most pretentious moving picture yet offered to the public. Into the "Life of John Bunyan" and "Pilgrim's Progress," Mr. Hochstetter has put a number of his photographic findings, including his (Expm) Process of plastic natural motion photography, and which, when shown at Carnegie Hall, was pronounced by the press of New York "the most gorgeous picture pageant ever shown." No production that has appeared on the boards of a New York music hall or theatre has been accorded the unanimous verdict of "John Bunyan" and "Pilgrim's Progress," made by the Hochstetter-Pierson process.

In presenting the "Life of Bunyan," Mr. Pierson introduced for the first time a new form of entertainment which he christened "Symphony Photo Drama." In connection with the "Life of Bunyan," he has had composed, arranged, and adapted from the works of the world's masters, by the foremost orchestra in New York, an orchestra and organ score accompanying the pictures, making the performance a double one, consisting of a "Recital and Moving Picture," together forming the most unique and startling production ever afforded in the history of music and drama and one that will be followed and imitated, in fact has already been so in the production of "The Miracle" at Her Majesty's Theatre in London and in A. H. Wood's production at the Park Theatre in New York City. At the present time, the Hochstetter-Pierson Company are engaged in making three productions which are daring, and their originality and spectacular greatness will be far in advance of anything ever attempted in the history of cinematography.

The production of Pilgrim's Progress will be shown at Tremont Temple, at Boston, Mass., beginning April the 28th, and for the following three (3) weeks, going from there to Orchestra Hall, Chicago, for the two following weeks, and then coming in from Chicago to Broadway for a New York run.

AMERICAN BASEBALL TEAM ISSUES CHALLENGES

Now that the pleasant weather has started, and spring is here, not only does the "young man's fancy lightly turn to thoughts of love," but baseball as well. In pursuance of this markedly national tendency, the factory forces of the American Film Manufacturing Company have organized or reorganized the "Flying A" baseball team. Exuberant spirits, noon practice in the prairie and challenges are now the order of the day.

ITALA FILM COMPANY

Ermete Zacconi, by merit successor to Salvini, and known as the Mansfield of Italy, has appeared in his second and last picture play for the Itala Film Company.

This actor was "discovered" by Elenora Duse. She encouraged and coached him, and in a few years he outgrew minor parts and headed his own company. His grasp of details and exhaustive study of the qualifications of his parts is Mansfieldian.

His acceptance of the Itala Film Company's offer was not prompted by mercenary motives as he is now wealthy. His wish was to see his art perpetuated on the enduring negative as an object lesson for coming generations of players. Zacconi's first appearance for the Itala Film Company was in "The Palace of Flames." His last work is in "The Dread of Doom." In the latter film his part is that of a physician who dies after having accidentally taken strychnine. Physicians agree that the death convulsions are so accurately depicted that, as was fecetiously remarked, he must have spent his spare time watching people die.

As we grow nigh to the suicide months, as July and August are called by those who have studied the statistics of self-destruction, it is probable that "The Dread of Doom," the new Itala feature film, will serve to convince many that death by strychnine poisoning is hardly the best bet for those tired of this life.

Medical men are agreed that the acting of Ermete Zacconi, known as the Mansfield of Italy, and the successor to Salvini, in his depictions of the death convulsions of a man under the stress of the potent drug, is graphically accurate.

KATHLYN WILLIAMS, who was recently married to Robert Allen, of the Burbank Theatre, in Los Angeles, last week purchased an extensive tract of residence property in one of the suburbs near Los Angeles. It is Miss Williams' intention to build a unique bungalow upon this site which she and her husband can use for a home while they are located in the Southern metropolis.

Motiograph Moves to New Offices in New York City

The Motiograph Company have moved their New York office from 30 East Twenty-third street to 21 East Fourteenth street. A 1913 Model Motiograph Machine is being installed by J. H. Hallberg in the new Crown Theatre at Hackensack, N. J., which will open on May 3d.

EDNA CUNNINGHAM

Our circle this week shows a recent photograph of ingenue lead, Edna Cunningham, who has played in "The Lure of City," "Grafters," "Hoodoo Pearls," "A Cruel Suspicion," and "For the Love of Columbine." She is young, and full of vivacity, and the industry will hear and see more of her in a short while in films of Reliance releases.

And view the picture screen!

THE real "picture play fan" is loyal to his favorites. The actors and actresses who pose in the pictures each have his or her devoted admirers. There are many instances where patrons will not attend the moving picture theatre unless this or that actor or actress is appearing on the day's program. The "matinee idol" has been supplanted by the "moving picture idol." So intense has the admiration become that film concerns are working overtime to supply information concerning members of their stock companies. Every film editorial department and every trade journal, and many newspapers, receive countless requests anent the personalities of leading film players. The majority of these artists have graduated from the legitimate stage of the moving picture studio. They took time by the forelock and braved the contemptuous comments of fellow players several years ago, and now they are reaping the rewards of good salaries and no one-night stands. The waiting list of every moving picture studio is now filled with the names of actors and actresses who a few short years ago would have refused to appear in moving pictures.

There was a time when the manager of the moving picture "show," conducted in a storeroom with the aid of a bed-sheet and a brazen-throated phonograph, was rather in disrepute. To-day ten millions of people delight to do honor to the exhibitor of Cinematograph offerings. Not many years ago the moving picture "show" was conducted 'midst the humblest of surroundings. To-day the finest theatres in this country are open to the tabloid drama. Stageland's most formidable rival is Filmland, and the word "movies" is synonymous with uplifting entertainment for young and old.

The year 1912 was a momentous year for Filmland. In 1912 Cinematography was recognized by pulpit and press; saffron-hued newspapers, which habitually laid all the human misdeeds to the moving pictures, ceased their attacks, and many of them are now conducting "picture play pages." Thousands of churches installed moving picture projecting machines Pictures having to do with Biblical and educational subjects became popular. Moving pictures were shown in public schools and, according to some educators, moving pictures will revolutionize courses of study in the classrooms.

We notice that the straight silhouette is quite comme il faut, as we say in Boston picture theatres.

* * * *

The effect of moving pictures on legitimate theatrical entertainments during the past two years has been startling. Moving pictures have supplanted the old-time melodrama and the former circuits of theatres throughout the country showing "tank dramas" have been put out of business. Not only this, but more pretentious theatrical attractions have suffered. Many of the patrons of high-priced theatres are refusing to pay $1.50 for a seat when they can enjoy the pictures for admission prices of from five to twenty-five cents. The best actors and actresses in this and other countries are no longer ashamed to pose. Bernhardt blazed the trail and was paid $30,000 to appear in filmed productions of "Queen Elizabeth" and "Camille." The Frohmans and Schuberts became interested and are heavy stockholders in moving picture ventures. James K. Hackett, Mrs. Fiske, James O'Neill, Lillian Russell, Marshall P. Wilder, Nat Goodwin and many others, have recently posed for film plays.

We predicted a year ago that the stars of the legitimate stage would be seen in the pictures and we were laughed to scorn Developments proved our assertion a fact and to-day even the greatest in Stageland delight to do honor to the pictures. The latest "dope" is that Charles Frohman, H. A. Spanuth and Alf Hayman have formed a $1,000,000 stock company which will produce motion picture films in which all the prominent artists will appear. The stars thus posing for the films will include Maude Adams William Gillette, Alla Nazimova. Hattie Williams, Richard Carle, Billie Burke, Edith Wynne Matthison, John Drew, Julia Sanderson and others. Besides these recognized stars, the casts supporting them will be virtually the same as those seen on the stage.

The moving picture has brought the theatre to millions of people in all countries who had hardly even heard of that institution before. It has also brought fame and fortune to numerous individuals who, ten years ago, were unknown. Carl Laemmle, a few years ago, conducted a clothing establishment in Oshkosh, Wis. When the moving picture was in its infancy he started a small "store-show." Like others in that early period, he made easy money. He used the profits to open other "shows." He sold them for profit and, entering Chicago, he started a film exchange and sold and rented films for other exhibitors. To-day his fortune is estimated at $3,000 000.

M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, a few years ago was proprietor of a moving picture theatre at Marion, Ohio. He sold his business and entered the field at Cincinnati. He conceived the idea of organizing the exhibitors into protective associations. The first meeting was held at Columbus, Ohio, only a few years ago. To-day the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America boasts of a hundred thousand members, and nearly every state in the Union boasts of state auxiliaries. State and national conventions are held yearly and the leading statesmen of the nation think it an honor to be invited to address the meetings.

"Will there be radical changes in the character of present moving picture plays?" was asked of an authority.

"The character of the regular moving picture film release is undergoing a radical change right now," was the prompt reply. "The film stories will be more dignified and more convincing. Crime pictures, so called, are being rapidly eliminated, and exaggerated action is to be a thing of the past. The alleged comedy which ridicules the racial characteristics of Jews, Irish, German and others will no longer be tolerated. The drama and comedy of the 'every-day people' will be the vogue before many weeks. The cowboy picture is also undergoing a change. The sensational play of Western border life is being supplanted with the historical Western drama of a spectacular character and every care is to be taken by the majority of film manufacturers to release productions of a refined and moral nature."

Thomas A. Edison is devoting much of his attention to Cinematography. Talking the other day in his laboratory over at Orange, N. J., he asserted that he was working on a series of educational films that would revolutionize our educational system. He plans to substitute educational films for text-books in the eight lower grades of the public schools and teach the children, as we study nature, through the eye.

"To teach the children you've got to awaken their minds and keep their interest at the highest pitch," said Mr.. Edison. "I intend to try and do away with the text-books in the lower grades, substituting in their place moving pictures. We've got a lot of hieroglyphics—the alphabet. What is there in that to interest a child? When we get moving pictures in the school the child will be so interested that he will hurry to school for fear he will miss some of the interesting pictures having to do with nature, with history, with psychology, geography, etc. It's the natural way to teach—through the eye. We learn from observation."

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

The Green-Eyed Monster

DON'T let the Green-eyed Monster get a grip on you.

Just because the man or woman across the way can write a better script now than you, is no reason why you should become jealous. Be nice; engage in friendly rivalry; try to excel; but do not get into the clutches of the Green-eyed Monster. Some of our friends, in the keen excitement of the chase, are apt to become the least bit disgruntled, occasionally, and claim that "my scripts are just as good as Jones'"; that "Jones is being unduly exploited"; or that "I can't pick up the paper without seeing a puff for Jones, who doesn't really amount to much as a writer anyway." Forget it. If Jones is favored by the types so may you be favored some day. Jones would not be exploited and nice things said about his work if he were not deserving. You try to excel and some fine day you may supplant Jones. Jealousy is, in the main, weak mindedness. It is the triumph of thoughtless discontent over reason. The clouding of the clear mental vision with mists of prejudices. We are not speaking of the jealousy of the heart, but of the mind; the common, long and dreary mental discontent that may become a habit. Be generous! That is the only way to happiness and success. That is the first necessity in solving the jigsaw puzzle of advancement.

Don't let the Green-eyed Monster get a grip on you!

Inquest Club Dinner

On Saturday evening, May 31, the Inquest Club, a New York City society of script writers, will give their first annual dinner. Price of dinner tickets is two dollars. Applications may be sent to Epes Winthrop Sargent, Box 70 Madison Square Station, New York.

He Didn't Know It All

"He didn't seem to know it all, so I gave him a chance," remarked a prominent Script Editor to us yesterday. We were discussing a new "find." This "find" is achieving success. He didn't know it all. When his first script was rejected he failed to write a scathing letter to the editor pointing out just how the rejected plot excelled most of the stories seen on the screens. He just thanked the editor for a few words of advice and tried again. He tried the same market and has succeeded.

Progressive Progressiveness

The Progressive Party is engaging certain script writers of reputation to write stories around the well-known principles of the T. R. band. These stories will be widely released the coming Fall.

This One Pleased Us

The following letter pleased us. Why? Because it causes a belief that our work is not entirely fruitless. The letter from Chicago: "I wish to thank you for your favors. As you advise, I am going to get down to hard work and see if I, too, cannot become a successful picture play writer. Your interest in my work is appreciated and helpful, and your articles in the Moving Picture News have enabled me to sell some of my stories."

Extra! Extra!

Mr. B. P. Schulberg, publicity man of the Famous Players Film Company, and a picture playwright of renown, is writing poetry!

Dear Old Collier's!

Dear Old Collier's Weekly! In the editorial columns of a recent issue is a roast on pernicious advertising. In the Collier's advertising section of the same edition appear several weird announcements of "correspondence schools." Consistency is indeed a jewel! Then Cosmopolitan heads one classified column with a "school" advertisement which urges everyone to "make $1,200 a year for spare time writing one picture play every week; literary ability is not necessary!"

Let George Do It!

Two weeks ago we offered to mention any correspondence school professor who had five or more plays written by himself or herself that have been produced for lo, these many years. Many there came and few were chosen. The offer has expired. But Mr. George Hennessy came in early. Mr. Hennessy coyly admits teaching the young scenario idea how to shoot from 1 Union Square, Room 611-614, New York City. He also stepped to the home plate with close up to a hundred plays written by himself, and produced by various companies within the past two years. His work is also endorsed by Epes Winthrop Sargent. Mr. Hennessy writes scripts to order on short notice and writes them well. We have no hesitancy in recommending would-be students to his attention which is individual and guaranteed to fatten the batting average of the joy-of-script-writing.

Posey for Mrs. Rubenstein

We received a marked copy of the Morning Journal of Columbus, Ohio, the other day, and it contained a double-column half-tone likeness of Mrs. Lillian M. Rubenstein, formerly of the Lubin editorial staff. The article says she is a successful writer of picture plays, and that through her efforts large quantities of clothing have been sent Ohio flood sufferers from six Philadelphia schools. Mrs. Rubenstein previous to her marriage was a resident of Columbus, and for some years was a newspaper writer. The article says she is now the head of the Lillian M. Rubenstein School of Picture Play Authors, and that she is widely known through her earnest labors in the field of philanthropy.

Letter from Mr. Byrnes

Mr. Paul J. Byrnes writes us the following chaste epistle which is self-explanatory: "I note with pleasure your reference to the Central West Playwrights' dinner to be held at the Hotel Euclid, Cleveland, Saturday night, June 28th. From all indications reservations are coming in, and from letters from writers, editors and others of the picture profession, it looks as if this is going to be a great event. And why not? Operators can have dinners, exhibitors can have dinners, and the film men, so why not the authors and writers—the ones who furnish the ideas which give all the rest of the profession work? The dinner will be $2 a plate, and everyone in the Central West knows what kind of a dinner the Hotel Euclid serves. The Lake Shore and General Film Companies will show some up-to-date films and leading authors will explain how they conceived and wrote successful plots. Reservations should be made to Paul J. Byrnes, P. O. Box 275, Cleveland, Ohio, not later than June 10th. Mr. A. W. Thomas and Mr. R. D. Stoddard, of the Cleveland News-Leader, will also accept reservations. Every lady and gentleman of the profession invited, but send in for reservations for they are going rapidly. Also furnish names of those whom you would like to have invited."

How to Write a Play

"The Caldron" is a nifty little monthly magazine edited by Eugene V. Brewster, editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, Brooklyn, N. Y. We take it and read it. A recent number tells how to write a play. This article deals with the legitimate play so-called, and is interesting and instructive to the budding dramatist. Here is one assertion that is also applicable to picture play writing: "If the play is declined, do not be discouraged, because no two readers have the same ideas, and what may be quickly discarded by one, may be seized by the other just as quickly."

What the American Is Up To

The American Film Manufacturing Company is purchasing stories from Street & Smith, publishers of the "Popular" and other magazines. If you can write a story acceptable to Street & Smith may be you will be writing for the American Film Company at one and the same time.

The Contract Writer

There is a young gentleman in Chicago, who has quickly become successful as a script writer. His other occupation is that of writing magazine fiction. He is selling all the scripts he cares to write, and is getting top-notch prices for them. Recently he wrote in asking our advice. A well-known film concern wishes to tie him up in a contract. He now has four steady markets for his playlets, and why he should wish to close all but one of them is more than we can understand. This contract business seems to be gaining in popularity—but not with the successful script writer. We have had our experiences, and just yesterday one of the best known writers and editors in the business informed us that he was cutting loose from contract work and would again cater to the general market.

Many Thanks!

A man in Los Angeles writes in to tell us that all trade journal scribes are "dippy," and that he can do much better than any of them singly or collectively. Incidentally he says he is about to dash off and offer a bundle of essays on the art of writing to the trade. Maybe he is essaying too much.

Pertinent Pointers

Suspense is an element of prime importance in a script. Keep the spectator guessing until the final moment. Suspense is another term for strength.

Carry the interest in your lead straight through the plot. Do not shift the interest to another character in the final twenty feet of film. It frequently spoils the plot.

Action is more effective than leader. Hence we again assert: Cut out the sub-titles wherever possible.

We believe in plunging right into the thick of things in the first scene. Avoid preparatory or explanatory scenes. Start from the very first in the unfolding of your plot with ever increasing interest until the climax.

A picture play script is spoiled for us if the first scene is started with a leader. Neither are we inclined to the leader: "Ten Years Later." Lapse of time will weaken any story.

Be clean. Avoid shady characters, drunkards, harlots, thieves, and counterfeiters. Selig and other first-class concerns have placed the ban on plots requiring inhabitants of the underworld. The suggestive plot is the worst of all.

Cut-backs mean emphasis by contrast. Biograph is especially partial to the contrasting scenes. It is a device that often adds effectiveness to the plot.

Do not labor after effects. Submit a properly constructed picture play and permit the director to attend to his end of the business. He can do it better than you.

Remember that comedy is difficult to write and is always in demand. In the spoken drama the lines carry the comedy. In the picture play, comic situations are essential. Humorous action and plot are desired and you must tell what that humorous action is.

Kindly Remember

Kindly remember that a self-addressed and stamped envelope is necessary for replies by mail.

Slightly Confused

An inquirer of Montreal, Can., asks which of two "schools" named is the "best company" to submit scripts. The writer says that one "school" cuts the "course" to $5 if the money is sent within ten days. To new readers we will hurriedly state that these correspondence "schools" do not produce pictures, and to Montreal our best advice is to save the money and read the moving picture trade journals.

Tip to Fiction Writers

To those picture playwrights who also dabble in magazine work here's a tip: The editor of The Railroad Man's Magazine writes that he is in need of good "fillers" of one hundred to three hundred words in length, and will also read stories and special articles of one thousand to twelve hundred words in length.

A Hummer for Henderson

Mr. Will T. Henderson, of Chicago, is pardonably pleased because he submitted a comedy-drama to Vitagraph on March 19th and received acceptance on March 31st. You can always depend on quick action from Vitagraph. Then William T. in commenting on our depressing fear that Bertha M. Clay may be the next notable to be engaged by the Universal to write scripts, remarks: "Give us Elinor Glyn in 'three weeks' or sooner, but not Bertha, kind sir—not Bertha!" Mr. Henderson also compliments Ernst Luz and his department on moving picture music. We will not publish the remainder of Mr. Henderson's letter because the stuff is far cleverer than our copy—and we need the money.

Cheer Up, Jones!

Marc Edmund Jones, of Chicago, went to New York to attend Mr. Sarhent's party, and he likes the surroundings so well that he refuses to return to that dear Windy City. Jones made six sales in eight days, and then last week he had twenty rejections. Now Marc Jones knows something about script writing and those twenty rejections do not bother him in the least. He knows that the rejection slip is bound to come to us all, and twenty in one week puts a quick ending to suspense. Here is a little object lesson to the beginner who experiences weeping and gnashing of teeth when five or six of his scripts are declined. Do like Jones will do. Watch the market and work 'em over with bursts of song and a genial sparkle in the eye.

Report Not Credited

The report current that Richard Goodall, former editor-in-chief of the Universal, is to be succeeded by genial Joe Brandt, is not universally credited. George Hall gets the position, we understand.

A Sample Scenario

Mr. Walter MacNamara, script writer, submits a scene from a "sample scenario" submitted to him recently. Here it is: Scene 6—Interior prison. Little girl (cripple with crutch) is seen picking wild flowers.

Let us draw the curtain of charity over the rest of the scene.

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

S. S. HUTCHINSON MAKES IMPORTANT CHANGES AT SANTA BARBARA STUDIO

Important changes have occurred since the return of Mr. Hutchinson at the Santa Barbara headquarters. Principal among these was the engaging of Albert W. Hale, a producer of Vitagraph and Thanhouser experience, who will hereafter have charge of the first company. The western business management has been given into the hands of Wallace Kerrigan, twin brother of Jack Kerrigan, the American's leading man. Mr. Wallace Kerrigan has been with the "Flying A" forces ever since the company was sent to California almost two years ago, and during that time devoted his energies toward the business end. The new arrangement will make toward greater and better "Americans."

A MATTER OF HONOR

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Kinemacolor Release)

MAY'S friendship for Tom and Frank began when the three were in high school. She was not a girl to make many friends, but her devotion to these two boys was extreme. The boys, too, were devoted to May and to each other.

All went well through high school, but the following autumn the boys went to college. Then trouble began. At first it was only a matter of friendly jealousy because of more frequent or longer letters to one. This caused a slight drawing apart, but only in their hearts, for to all appearances they were as friendly as ever.

The day came when their graduation was over. The night before they were to leave for home Frank and Tom sat together on the college campus, their thoughts of the future mingled with thoughts of the years they had just passed through.

Frank pulled a few handfuls of grass and threw them away before he spoke.

"Tom," he began earnestly, yet trying to put into his voice the usual half-joking note, "Tom, we came here as boys; we are leaving for good now, as men. Do you know that there is a very serious question facing us?"

Tom looked up quickly and Frank saw that he knew.

"Each summer we have gone home we have found May lovelier and more lovable than the last," continued Frank. "And she has become more quiet and serious. Tom, we both love May as a man loves—there is no getting away from that fact—and we've got to find out which one of us she loves enough to marry—if either one."

"Then she has never hinted that she loves you more than as a friend?" asked Tom eagerly.

"I swear it."

"But what can we do? We both love her equally well."

"Perhaps we may both have to face the same thing," suggested Frank. "She may love neither of us."

Tom turned over on his back and lay looking at the stars. Suddenly seizing the grass on each side of him he sat up and turned to his chum.

"Frank," he said hoarsely, "if May says she doesn't love me, I don't believe I can stand it. And yet I could not bear to see you unhappy. It's a terrible situation."

"Well, it must come," said Frank, "and one of us has got to be hard hit unless we both are. We'll find out soon."

"Yes, we'll find out soon."

The two young men returned to their native town. Frank had waiting for him a position in a bank of which his father had been president for many years before his death. Tom had yet to be located, but his hopes were bright.

About a week after their return Tom called upon May. It was a clear June evening and they walked out from the town to a spot which had been very dear to the three in their younger days.

Tom threw himself down beside the girl and began speaking at once

"May, I love this spot ever since we first came here. Do you remember the fine violets we used to pick?"

"Yes, you and Frank and I. Oh, what good times we used to have. I almost wish they were back again."

Tom took her hands and lay gazing into her face. "Perhaps the future will be even better. I want you to think of the future, May, and think of me with it."

FRANK GOES WEST AND MAKES A FRIEND OF THE INDIAN

She withdrew her hands and looked away from Tom's searching eyes.

"Don't you love me, May?" he asked anxiously.

"I have loved you since we were children, Tom, but——"

"But what?"

"Why, I love you in the same way now."

"Don't you love me more?"

"Yes, I do love you more, but I can't marry you. That is what you mean, isn't it?"

"Yes."

May was silent for a time, then she put her hand on Tom's head and said gently: "I must tell you something. Frank asked me the same question last night—and—and——"

"Well?"

"My answer was a little different."

"You mean that you will marry Frank?"

May nodded and her eyes avoided Tom's.

"You say that you love me. Why do you choose Frank?" asked Tom slowly.

"Dear Tom," cried the girl, "I love you both. I have loved you for years. I wish I could marry both—or do something without hurting the other one. I knew, of course, that this was coming, and so I had to decide. I don't know why, but I feel that I would rather marry Frank."

"I hope you will be happy," was all Tom could say, and the look of his face kept May's eyes open most of the night.

Tom left town without seeing Frank. When he returned his friends scarcely knew him. He had given up when May told him she could not marry him, and had not tried to make anything of his life. Consequently his time was filled with drinking and gambling.

May and Frank had been married several months when

Tom returned. May was heartbroken when she heard of his bad habits. "Can't you do something, Frank?" she urged. "We have both loved Tom for so long, we must not let him go to ruin."

That night Frank went to see his old chum. At first there was silence between them and some embarrassment.

"Well, old man, what is it you want to say? I know you came to say something," began Tom.

"Yes, I did," Frank acknowledged. "I beg your pardon for mentioning it; you may not think it is our business, but May and I are sorry to see you doing as you are. In fact, she is heartbroken."

"What do you want me to do? I haven't any work and I can't get any now. Besides, what's the use? I have no interest in life."

"First come to see us. Talk to May. I can't begin to talk to you as she can. Say, do you know, old fellow, if I wasn't sure that May loved me, I'd be jealous of you. May loves you very much."

"Even now?"

"Yes, even now."

"Well, I'll come!" cried Tom, springing to his feet. "And I'll not drink another drop, for her sake. You know I love her, Frank; I'll not make a secret of that."

"Yes, I know, and I'm not afraid."

And so it came about that Tom became a frequent visitor of Frank and May. The good council of the girl gave him new courage and a new outlook upon life. It was worth much to have her friendship and the freedom of her home.

Very soon after Tom's first visit to the home of his friends there was a bookkeeping position open at the bank where Frank worked. This was offered to Tom. He gladly and gratefully accepted it and went to work with a will.

The days passed pleasantly for the three friends until the next summer. Then Frank began to have business out of town. "Now that I have some one to look after May, I can go away now and then." In answer to May's questions he always answered, "Oh, I've made some investments and I must look after them a little."

One evening when Tom appeared at Frank's home May told him her husband had not come home to dinner but had telephoned that he would dine with a friend and not be home until late.

Tom and May spent the evening together as usual. They talked of their high school days and the things they used to do. Once or twice they got a little too near the dangerous subject, but Tom always had the courage to turn the conversation into another channel. When they said good-night at eleven o'clock they could look as frankly into each other's eyes as before.

"Don't be anxious," Tom said, as he saw May watching the clock. "He's probably talking business and has forgotten the time. Besides, he knows I'm here to take care of you. But I must go, now, and if I meet him I'll tell him to hurry home to you."

On the way to his rooms Tom had to pass the bank where he worked. As he passed under one of the back windows he stopped suddenly. "That's funny," he thought, "there is never a light in there." A faint ray of light showed beneath the heavy blind.

Tom went quickly and let himself in with his key. On the threshhold of the room from which the light came he stopped. A man was bending over his books. In a moment he recognized Frank. One look at his face as he raised it made Tom exclaim, "Good God, what's the matter, Frank; what have you done?"

Frank stepped back from the books and stood staring at Tom. "I thought you were with May," he whispered hoarsely.

Tom went to the desk and hurriedly examined the open pages. Turning upon Frank, he stood staring at him, trying to believe his eyes.

"What does this mean?" he demanded at last.

Frank did not speak.

"You were changing my books. You must have a reason. Have you been using the bank's funds?"

Frank did not deny it.

"For what?" insisted Tom.

"Speculating."

"The same old story! Oh, Frank, how could you do such a thing—with May as your wife. How could you!"

Frank was silent.

"For God's sake speak, man!" demanded Tom. "What were you going to do? Let the bank think I had done this? Oh, Frank, Frank!"

Frank found his tongue. "You have not been such a model that you can preach to me."

"No, I have not, but what I did never harmed anyone but myself," answered Tom, "and it was at least in the open."

"I suppose you'll tell the whole thing to-morrow."

"Frank, I can't do that, for your sake and for May's; I cannot," said Tom, huskily. "Can't you get the money before any one knows?"

"Yes, I'll get it to-morrow; I swear it," promised the guilty man.

The next morning when Tom went to work he was confronted by a detective and several officials of the bank. "We are waiting for you, sir," he was told.

"For what reason?" he asked in a voice of guilt.

"Oh, I think you know. It was just a lucky accident that made us discover your crime," he was informed.

"Gentlemen, give me a moment. This matter can be explained. Let me telephone, please," pleaded Tom in desperation.

THE OLD INDIAN STANDS BY THE LONELY GRAVE OF HIS FRIEND FRANK

"Certainly, telephone—from here," he was answered.

Tom rang up Frank's residence. May answered the telephone.

"Oh, Tom," she said in answer to his inquiry, "I am so worried; Frank came home about an hour after you left and told me he had received a telegram calling him out West, and he left on the night train. He seemed so worried. Can you tell me what it means?"

Tom hung up the receiver without answering. Turning to the gentlemen he said, "Gentlemen, I am ready to go with you."

That evening, still waiting for Tom to come to give her the explanation, May picked up the paper. "Oh," she cried, as she read a certain headline. Breathlessly she read down the column. "Oh," she cried again, "I see it all now. I see it all. Frank has done this and Tom has gone to prison for my sake."

The defaulter and the prisoner suffered, but no more than the wife and friend left alone. Night and day she wondered over and over what she could do. She was torn between her desire to keep her husband's terrible secret and her desire to free the innocent man. She realized, however, that she was really powerless to act, for she knew what she knew only by her intuition and not by any proof she could give to others.

The months passed by until six had gone. Then, one day, May received a package by express. When she took off the first wrapper there was a letter addressed in Frank's handwriting. With trembling hands she opened it and read:

"Dearest May:

"I wonder if you know the truth, and what has been the result of my terrible act?

"I am writing you the whole truth, for I have been hurt and cannot live but a few days. An old Indian whom I saved from some cowboys when I first arrived has been a great friend to me. When I am gone he will send you this letter and package. Through him I have become a rich man.

"I took the money from the bank, thinking, as every other man before has thought, that I could pay it back. I speculated because I wanted to make more money for you, dear. I changed Tom's books because I knew he was too honest for me to tell him the trouble and get his help. I honestly did not expect that he would be accused but that I could get the money before he discovered that his books had been fixed up.

"When I left the bank that night I knew I could not get the money, but my courage failed me and I ran away. I have not dared to look at a paper since I left, but I am afraid Tom has had to suffer.

"This is not to be sent until I am gone, so you must feel free to go at once to the president of the bank and tell him the true story. The nuggets will more than pay the debt.

"Try to forgive me and ask Tom to. God bless you both. Good-bye.

"Your still loving,

"FRANK."

May sat still for a moment, almost unable to think. The task before her filled her with both joy and sorrow. Tom would be freed and vindicated but Frank's name must be blackened.

In her heart she knew that there was but one thing to do, and this she did as bravely as she could.

The love May had always had for Tom grew stronger, and in time they were living in a tie of friendship and love that nothing could break.

Many times when the days were bright they were looked at with envy as they played with their little girl on the lawn.

Always they kept green the memory of the man they both had loved. Often at sunset they would look toward the West, both with the same unspoken thought. And if their eyes could have seen through the distance they would have beheld an old Indian standing by the lonely grave of a white friend whom he had greatly loved.

ITALA FEATURES POPULAR

The experience of Mr. F. W. Foster of Montreal, Canada, with "The Palace of Flames," evidences the money-getting powers of features in Canada. For his first seven day bookings of this Itala feature he obtained $550. Although the film is comparatively young in Canada, up to date it has earned more than a thousand dollars.

The eastern Pennsylvania and the southern New Jersey rights on "Tigris" and "The Shadow of Evil" have been purchased by the Attractive Feature Film Company of Philadelphia. Mr. J. Singer, manager of the Attractive Feature Film Company, is permitted to book the latter film in Delaware, Maryland and District of Columbia.

The Moore Feature Film Company of Chicago is apparently seeking to corner the market on big features in the Middle West. Supplementing their original order for "Tigris" and "The Shadow of Evil" for Indiana, Ohio and Kentucky, they have purchased another print of both subjects for Michigan and Wisconsin.

TWO KINEMACOLOR PRODUCTIONS

"The Blessing of Sleep" and "The Scarlet Letter" are well worthy the attention of every exhibitor who can run them in his theatre. They teach a lesson that goes home. "The Scarlet Letter" is a well-known story and needs no further words from me except to say that the way Kinemacolor have produced it is exceedingly fine and choice. In the "Blessing of Sleep" it tells the occult story of the astral of the man being shown various scenes where sleep often acts as an antidote and brings people to their proper senses. It is a story that holds the attention of the audience from beginning to end, and the dissolving effects are exceedingly fine, and now that it is possible to project Kinemacolor with thirty-five amperes the whole troubles have vanished from film realm.

SEEKING AID OF MAYORS AND GOVERNORS

Educators Desire Community Support in School Hygiene Program

In view of the serious importance of school hygiene to the child, the school, the home and the community, the Organizing Committee of the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene, to be held at Buffalo, August 25-30, is inviting the attendance, not only of educators, physicians, hygienists and scientists, but also of delegates from all the leading towns and cities, and from the states and territories of this country.

No effective campaign for the extension of modern methods in school hygiene can be carried on without a community backing, announces the organizing committee, and one of the prime objects of the forthcoming Congress is to secure this endorsement. Letters have been sent to several hundred mayors, and to the governors of all the states and territories, requesting the appointment of delegates.

The successful co-operation of all these influences, according to the Buffalo program, will mean the establishing of efficient medical, hygienic and sanitary supervision in schools, giving in return:

For the child: Increased comfort, greater happiness, larger schoolroom success, more safety and greater certainty of future efficiency.

For the school: Fewer absences from the schoolroom, few interruptions on account of epidemics, and more satisfactory educational response to classroom activities.

For the home: Less anxiety, less apprehension, fewer doctor bills, less work, more health, happiness and prosperity.

For the taxpayer: A saving by more efficient methods in school work, and also a larger product of active, intelligent, capable individuals, whose influence will be toward the improvement of every phase of community life.

For the community: Healthier and, therefore, more efficient and more prosperous citizens.

For the nation: Results measured in terms of the conservation of human life.

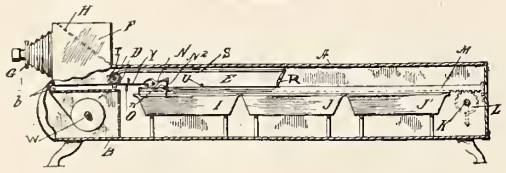
Representatives will be sent to Congress from all the leading nations, and from all the leading educational, scientific, medical and hygienic institutions and organizations of this country.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

Article 1, Section 8, of the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress has power to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to inventors the exclusive right to their respective discoveries. Obviously this provision was intended to stimulate invention, to the end that better results and ways of accomplishment might be discovered and devised, and to encourage the investment of time and money in the development of inventions, on the theory that the public would mainly benefit thereby,—the inventor only incidentally. The monopoly granted the latter does not run forever,—only for seventeen years. Nothing that existed before is monopolized by the inventor; the public may utilize everything known before the invention as freely as if the invention had never been conceived and perfected. The patentees' monopoly consists exclusively in the right, for a limited period, to enjoin others from making, using or selling only the identical thing which the inventor has produced and reduced to practical, usable form, subserving a useful purpose, beneficial to the community. But the use of the patented article is not compulsory. The public got along without it prior to the invention thereof, and can continue to do so if it wishes until the end of the patent term, when the invention will be public property, free to all. The Government contracts with the inventor to give him the exclusive control of his invention for a limited period in consideration of his perfecting and revealing the invention and thereafter dedicating it to the public forever. This contract the proposed Oldfield Bill seeks to nullify by its compulsory license clause which would enable a wealthy and unscrupulous competitor to destroy the limited monopoly which is the main incentive to the inventor. The question is, will you allow your representatives in Washington to stand for such absurd and dangerous legislation.

The Societe Anonyme des Celluloses Planchon, of Lyon, France, has applied for registration of the Trade-mark "PLAVIK" for photographic goods, machines and materials generally, including Kinematographic films and apparatus, claiming use since October, 1911.



The accompanying illustration is a longitudinal sectional elevation of photographing and developing apparatus patented to Geo. C. Beidler, of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, No. 1,057,397. This invention relates to apparatus designed primarily for reproducing writings, drawings, pictures, or the like, novel means being provided to convey the sensitized film through receptacles containing suitable developing and fixing fluids. A denotes a casing containing a compartment B, for a roll W, of sensitized paper which is projected between the rollers b, to travel over the top of said compartment and between rollers D, into the compartment E. There is an exposure chamber F, and a camera G, for taking the picture, there being an angularly disposed mirror H, for reflecting the image onto the sensitized film. The compartment E is provided with pans I, J and J1 to contain the liquids required in fixing and developing the exposed films. To draw the film through the several compartments, mechanism is provided consisting of a shaft K, having toothed wheels L, which mesh with a rack M, suitably guided and alternately reciprocated through the rotation of the shaft K, in opposite directions. The said rack carries clips N2, which clamp the edges of the film Y, and as the rack is moved outwardly, the film is carried through the several tanks. The clips are automatically released and set through contact with trips within the casing in the path of travel. The lever N comes in contact with pin n, when the rack has reached the limit of its forward movement, and the parts will remain in this relation until the rack has traveled nearly the limit of its outward movement when the upper end of the lever will strike a pin, thus releasing the clip to permit the discharge of the paper into the receptacle J1. After the paper is cut by the knife O, it is desirable to move the next succeeding film portion a short distance beyond the knife in order that it may be in the path of travel of the clips. To effect this initial movement of the film, a lever R is pivoted in the casing the lever carrying a pawl S, which projects into engagement with a ratchet wheel T, on the roller D. A pin U, on the rack, contacts with the lower end of the lever R, as the rack is reciprocated and the said lever is thereby oscillated to move the pawl and cause the rotation of the said roller D.

An amendment to sections 51 and 1472 of the Charter of Greater New York, which has not heretofore specifically named motion picture shows, has been introduced at Albany by Assemblyman Cuvillier in the form of a bill to include "any kinetoscope or moving picture performance" in the list of entertainments to be licensed. "Common shows" is the somewhat ambiguous title under which they are licensed at the present time, and unjustly so, for while popular they are not commonplace, being clearly differentiated from other forms of entertainment, and distinguished for excellence and quality as compared with the other miscellaneous shows of questionable merit included under that plebeian title. This tardy recognition is nevertheless welcome as another sure indication of the irresistible force and vitality inherent in this comparatively new Art,—the light of which can no longer be hidden under the bushel of professionel jealousy. Cinematography is no longer a fad or craze, but now an established and indispensable institution, as much so as the Telephone or The Moving Picture News.

The camera illustrated below is of a type wherein the sensitized material is fed in a continuous strip across the focal plane, and the previously exposed portion simultaneously fed into a receptacle for developing or storage purposes and severed simultaneously with the disposal of a fresh portion of the strip in the focal plane. The front is connected to the main casing by the usual bellows 5, and the casing is movable on the bed in guides 6, for focusing as usual. The casing consists of a body portion 7 in rear of which is a movable back 8 which with the body at 9 forms an exposure chamber 10. The lower portion of the body is extended rearwardly, as at 11, to form a storage chamber 12 having a lining 13 to accommodate a pan 14 into which are received the negatives after the exposure for development or storage. The roll holder 19 contains a reel 20 upon which sensitized material 21 is coiled, and withdrawn from the chamber 15 through an exit opening 22 at the top of the wall 17 from which it is led downwardly across the walls 16 and 18, as indicated at 23, and between rollers 24 and 25 that feed it into the receptacle 14. After an exposed length of sensitized material has issued through the passage 26 it is severed by a knife 45 reciprocating in guides 46 by a pinion 47 meshing with a rack 48 thereon, said pinion being carried on a shaft 49 provided with an exteriorly arranged operating crank. A spring 51 acting between the pinion 47 and a bearing support 52 of the shaft 49 operates to return the knife after the severing operation when the crank 50 is released, and to return the latter also. Gilbert S. Dey, of Rochester, N. Y., is the inventor of the above as set forth in Letters Patent No. 1,057,412, the improvements including also means for adjustments, preventing mistakes, &c.

It is an axiom that much depends upon the light in which a subject is viewed. An invention based on the physical law concerning the complementary colors of the spectrum has been made by a graduate of the Moscow School for Painting, Sculpture and Architecture, by which it is possible to paint several different scenes or designs on one and the same canvas. This interesting artistic device may be used with effect on the stage or utilized for home decoration. When the light changes, the canvas, chameleon like, changes in appearance. Thus a panel was exhibited at the Moscow Artistic Theatre which represented a scene with beautiful autumn tints in the red light of a sunset. When the light was changed the scenery changed with it, and a nymph was discovered in front of a tree, bathed in moonlight. It is claimed that wallpaper printed by this method is one color in daylight, different during twilight, and changes again by moon or lamp light. By the use of differently tinted lamps the changes may obviously be controlled by electrical switches.

The risibility of our transatlantic Cousins may not be premature in so far as their appreciation of American "humour" is concerned, but they certainly are "on" to the movies to the extent of 28,000,000 per week, that being the estimated average attendance at the Cinemeto Theatres, of which there are some 4,500 in Merrie England, representing a capital outlay of more than £12,000,000 sterling.

The question as to whether a patentee has a right to fix the price on a patented article is now for the first time "up to" the Supreme Court of the United States, in the "Sanatogen" case, certified from the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia—the issue, as stated in the plaintiff-appellant's brief, being—"Can a retailer sell a patented article having a license notice thereon restricting the price at which the article can be sold to the consumer, such sale being made at a lower price than the license price, without such sale constituting an infringement of a patentee's rights when the article is made by the patentee, but is purchased by the retailer from a jobber?" This is a momentous question, and the final decision of the august court of last resort will be awaited with unusual interest in many and various industries, particularly those relating to the art of cinematography.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

NEWMAN FRAMES TO BE DISPLAYED AT EXPOSITION

The Newman Manufacturing Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and 101-103 Fourth avenue, New York City, have contracted with the managing director of the International Exposition Company for space at the Moving Picture Convention to be held at the Grand Central Palace in New York City from July 7th to July 12th. They will have on display some of the very latest ideas in brass lobby displays, brass railings, interchangeable signs, etc. During the exposition the Newman Company will throw open their entire first floor of the New York branch to the use of visiting exhibitors, and every courtesy will be extended them. Mr. S. J. Newman, secretary of the firm, states that his salesmen on the road report that a great many exhibitors throughout the country are making preparations to attend the convention and it will be the biggest thing ever attempted along this line.

POWER'S INSTALLATIONS

Through the Walturdaw Company, of London, England, there have been installed thirty Power's No. 6's in twenty various theatres in the Birmingham district, also twelve No. 6's in Bradford, Sheffield, Aberdare and Plymouth.

The Metropolitan Opera House, of Philadelphia, has been equipped with motion pictures which are projected by Power's 6A.

The Quo Vadis pictures have been so successful that six Power's No. 6's have been purchased for other companies of this concern.

The following installations have been made:

One 6A complete with Inductor to Mobile Light & Railway Company, Mobile, Ala., through W. H. Peck, Atlanta, Ga.

One 6A with 14-inch magazines for 2,000 feet of film to Turn Hall, North Salina street, Syracuse, New York, through Auburn Film Company, Auburn, New York.

Two 6A complete equipment with motors and mechanical speed control to Charles Stalder, North Hill, Akron, Ohio, through Mutual Film Corporation.

One 6A complete with motor and mechanical speed regulator to W. H. Wilcox, Jonesboro, Ark., through Mutual Film Corporation, New Orleans.

One 6A complete to Star Theatre, Wytheville, Va., through General Film Company, Washington, D. C.

George A. Magie, salesman for the Pilot Company, will probably leave on another trip to the different exchanges in the very near future. Magie reports that the company is turning out some big stuff, and says he won't have any trouble in getting additional orders.

* * * *

In order to supply the demand for Pilot pictures the company is installing more new tanks and drying apparatus. They are shipping direct from their factory now, and have established a department for this purpose.

The Pilot Company is putting up a new projection room, the one they had previously being inadequate.

JUST GOSSIP

By The Mahoney

Benny Schulberg. Modest, thoughtful, practical, gifted, inventive, analytical, logical, flowery.

Your richly worded "pæan" on the Cinematographic art in the elaborately embellished Screen Club programme, is a symphonic blending of word-coloring, worthy a place among the best efforts of the late Robert G. Ingersoll, Elbert Hubbard, Richard Le Gallienne, William Marion Reedy, and other word painters.

Keep it up, Benny.

Mahoney Fred Held, tanned by the sun of the tropics and fairly exuding an atmosphere of health and vigor, acquired through strenuous outdoor work, as camera expert, with the World's Best Film Company at Tampa, Florida, made his appearance last week among the Mahoneys who gather on the "off days" in Exchange Alley.

Fred is a true pioneer in the technical department of the industry, with a record of fifteen years to his credit, with the foremost manufacturers in this country. He is not an importation, nor did he graduate from "die Technicum, Ilmenau," or "die Technical gewerbe schule" at Berlin; but when everything is "set," and Fred looks through his finder and says "ready!" you can depend upon absolute focal precision.

He has a perfect vision, a well-balanced, level head, and is easily classed among the most efficient experts in the camera world.

Mahoney Hayes Hunter's retirement from the Imp studio has cast a shadow of gloom over that "Bide a Wee" home for the regulars.

Hayes' diplomacy, patience and pyrotechnic method made a great and lasting impression with those who worked under his direction. His terpsichorean antics, waving of arms, and shouts of encouragement to the artists, are strongly suggestive of his prototype, Creatore, the quaint Italian musical director, popular in vaudeville a short while ago.

One enthusiastic admirer said of him:

"He's the best 'gink' in the business. We'd jump off the Woolworth building for Hayes, and—jump back again if he asked us."

Courtly, suave, and smiling John Gorman, known the length and breadth of this country, Australia, and England, is the eldest of the "Gorman Brothers," celebrated in minstrelsy and musical comedy for more than a quarter of a century past.

John is responsible for many of those intricately arranged, delightfully illuminated singing and dancing ensembles seen in the musical comedy productions of Broadway. He is a true Mahoney, being one of the first real professionals to work before the camera, away back in the "Nineties," at which time he directed and acted in a comedy production for one of the leading manufacturers of today, who was then in the beginning of his career.

* * * *

The Mahoney passed up Broadway a day or so since and tarried for a brief moment in front of that theatrical landmark of three decades ago, the "Bijou."

The lobby appeared dingy, faded, sere and yellow. Posters of wild animals in crouching attitudes of ferociousness adorned the bill-boards, while the figure of a forlorn doorkeeper was dimly outlined, leaning sleepily on the rail, with a —"Come in; don't be afraid; the animals are perfectly harmless!" sort of expression on his face.

Then came a dissolve.

The Mahoney saw the house brilliantly lighted, Broadway a moving mass of pedestrians, a long line of private equipages, public hacks, and cabs (autos and taxis were practically unknown) discharging their human freight, the lobby packed with beautiful women and well-groomed men, while at the curb, at various times, stood "Bob" Miles, Ed. E. Rice, "Jim" Barton, "Bob" Comly, "Johnny" Russell, "Charley" Hoyt; and back of the curtain, Lillian Russell (the Madame Recamier of to-day), Louise Searle (with a marvelous voice, who lived, and died, too soon), Eliza Weathersby, Amelia Summerville, Ada Gilman, Flora Walsh, Henry E. Dixey, Willie Collier, Charley Reed, Henry Donnelly, Eddie Girard, Harry Brown, and later, Amelia Bingham and Madame Nazimova.

Then came the philosophical thought:

"Tempori parendum,"

And with bowed head, the Mahoney passed on.

The Mittenthals, Harry and Aubrey, who a few short seasons ago occupied a prominent niche in the Melodrama Hall of Fame, are the most recent seceders from the theatrical ranks to enter the field of the motion pictures.

It is their intention to film all of their successes of the past ten years and more. Ed Wynard, the veteran, will be their camera operator, and Theodore Marsden, who, it is said, made a brilliant record with the Pathe people, will direct the productions.

With a plenitude of libraries, and a superabundance of authentic records on historical subjects, how is it that directors will make such glaring errors as are disclosed in so important a film as "Robespierre"?

* * * *

Where is the "King"? Report has it that he has not been seen at the "Palace" in Eleventh avenue for more than ten days.

Can it be possible that he has gone incognito on a hunt for big game?

Mine host Schmidt, of the Kaiser Keller, whose reputation for hospitality and generosity is a subect of constant comment among the regulars, it is reputed, intends early in June to "blow off" his numerous patrons among the Mahoneys with —his electric fans.

To Beat the Brush

William Alfred Corey is a-going to "beat the brush" in San Francisco, and see how many script writers he can "scare up." He will scare up a good many judging from our correspondence from that garden-spot-of-the-world. Mr. Corey thinks the scribblers should talk right out in meeting and assert themselves, and that the results will be better work and better recognition. Our columns are always open to you for that purpose, Corey, and to all other script writers.

The American Film Manufacturing Company promises something exceptional in spectacular pictures in the near release of "Marine Law." Two railroad trains and the ocean-going steamship, State of California, were extensively used. The vessel was obtained for use while lying in the harbor of Santa Barbara. Several hundred school children were utilized. The scenario is by R. D. Armstrong.

Leo Maloney, an old Bison actor, has returned to the Universal fold appearing under his old director, Milton H. Fahrney. Louis Fitzroy has been advanced to the position of assistant director to Mr. Fahrney. His military training is valuable to him in the production of the 101 Bison.

GAUMONT

FOR TWO PINS (May 22).—Mrs. Doodledum had the sobriquet of "The Old Scratch" because she wears hatpins which protrude beyond the edge of her hat and stick into people's faces, leaving marks of disrespect. She is a human porcupine, and persons whom she encounters in crowded places come to resemble Swiss cheeses on account of her puncturing pins.

A law is passed forbidding the wearing of hatpins unprotected by guards. Mr. Doodledum, thinking to please his wife, buys two guards for her.

A stubborn hussy is Mrs. Doodledum, and she swears by the nine lives of her pussy that she will not wear the shields and that she prefers her hatpins nude. While maneuvering and arguing the point with her husband a hatpoint grazes his eye. He pretends that he has been punctured and makes a great ado, putting a large cloth over his head, making him look as though he is trying to keep his hair from becoming sunburnt. Mrs. Doodledum, regretting her obstinacy, waits on him hand and foot, and then some.

She finally discovers that he is fooling her. She pretends that she has injured her knee. Accordingly both are laid up, although they really are in perfectly good running order. The doctor is summoned and prescribes an eyeshield to be put on the injured knee, a kneecap put on the wounded eye.

Mrs. Doodledum tires of the masquerade and, pulling the bandage from her husband's face, denounces his deception. It is then discovered that ki-isses and em-bra-ces are the best little remedies for marital illnesses.

THE LIGHT THAT KILLS (May 27).—Mrs. Smithson, a beautiful, cultured widow, takes a strong interest in Dr. Louis Jordan, whose application of electric rays, discovered by him, have been successful. Though Jordan has achieved many cures by his "A" rays he has been attacked by the powerful penetration and his left hand has already begun to wither. As no one else can apply the treatment with the same safety that his own expert knowledge commands, the scientist continues his labors with heroic sacrifice.

Mrs. Smithson acknowledges her love for the scientist. She suggests that others should continue his practice; that he should spend the rest of his life in health and happiness. Feeling that life holds something sweeter for him Louis Jordan makes over the plan of his work to his pupils, preparatory to his departure to a warmer climate.

As he is about to join Mrs. Smithson a poor woman implores him to treat her little son, who has been given up as a hopeless case. Failing to persuade her that his pupil can effect the same cure, the master undertakes the operation himself, knowing well that the rays which save in one case are fatal to himself. He realizes that to abandon his work for the sake of his own personal happiness is to be false to science, and is an indication of weakness.

When the operation is over he writes to Mrs. Smithson, asking her to forgive him for not seeing her again:

> "I could not love thee, dear, so much, > Loved I not honor more."

is the sentiment of his letter. Professor expresses that it will be an ample reward if, when she returns next summer, she will drop some flowers in the places he used to love.

Within the year the professor has gone the way of the heroes who sacrifice their lives in saving their fellow-creatures. When the woman he loved returns to the scene of his labors she learns that his noble spirit has been inherited by his favorite pupil, who takes the blooms she brings and puts them in the "places he used to love."

KINEMACOLOR

STEAM.—Two real love stories interwoven with the pictorial history of the discovery of steam power and its application to inventions that revolutionized the world.

This characteristic Kinemacolor combines historical, scientific, dramatic, biographical and educational interest, for it shows the development of steam power from the period when James Watt discovered its ability to lift the lid of a tea kettle—and deduced therefrom the hoisting engine for use in the English mine pits—to its culmination in the modern high-speed locomotive.

The chief incidents in the lives of the inventor of the first steam engine and George Stephenson, who built the first locomotive, are woven into the story—which includes the homely romances and happy marriages of both these homespun geniuses. Furthermore, the film shows a faithful model of the original Watt engine in operation, and also a working reproduction of Stephenson's queer-looking locomotive. The first trip of this historic engine is shown in the story—even to the humorous detail of the man on horseback riding ahead of the train and waving a red flag to warn the unsuspecting public off the track.

In one of the beautiful vision scenes—which Kinemacolor has developed so wonderfully of late—Watt dreams of the moving engine which is to come after his time, while Stephenson in turn has a vision of the ultimate development of his locomotive. In this concluding picture is shown one of the largest and most powerful high-speed locomotives ever built drawing a train of Pullman coaches at the rate of a mile a minute through the picturesque mountain scenery of California.

MODELING EXTRAORDINARY—An absolutely novel trick subject, full of amusing and unexpected developments. Only those in the know will realize the time and trouble that a film of this kind represents.

The title writes itself in neat, round hand from a little ball of putty that travels over a dark background. This is followed by the words "Kinemacolor-Urban-Smith Patents." A man then appears, trying, evidently without any great success, to make some pretty models. Suddenly, to his amazement, the putty begins to mold itself into shapes. It first takes the shape of a bantam, which crows at the astonished individual who stands watching the amazing development.

A heap of putty then forms into a spray of leaves; a beetle attaches itself to the end of the spray and forms a bud, which then opens into a bloom. A second bloom eventuates as a result of the same process.

A little model of the typical music-hall presentation of a Jew next appear. It twirls rapidly and becomes a hat. This becomes an iced cake, and that in turn a royal crown. As this slowly revolves, gems appear on the bars.

A lump of putty rolls itself out flat over a table; then suddenly curls itself up, and, behold! two towers! Other pieces of putty roll towards it and unfold themselves as essential portions of the fabric of a castle. In the end the castle has a drawbridge and flies a flag.

LUBIN

THE PADRE'S STRATEGY (May 13).—Ramona Martinez, a beautiful Mexican flower girl, is the support of her widowed mother and they live in a cottage on the outskirts of the city. One day while out gathering flowers for her basket she meets a Mexican youth and they are mutually attracted to each other. In time the acquaintance ripens into love and they are happy. Ramona still continues to sell her flowers in the cafes and other public places, and she and Jose plan that some day they will have a little home of their own. Manuel Vasquez, the leader of a band of Mexican guerillas, comes to the city one night and enters a cafe where many of the army officers and better class of Mexicans are enjoying themselves. Ramona passes from table to table, and finally comes to where Vasquez is seated. He is fascinated by her beauty and resolves to win her for himself, either by fair means or foul. He speaks to her, but she repulses him. He leaves the cafe and calls his lieutenant and one of his hand and tells them that they shall get the girl and bring her to him in the mountains. They go to the cafe and, as the girl leaves, they lie in wait for her. She is overpowered and carried away by the bandits. Jose, who is coming to meet her and take her home, sees the abduction, but is too late to be of any service. He enters the cafe and tells of Ramona's trouble. The habitues of the place are not interested in the flower girl, and his appeal for aid is unheeded. He then decides to go to the priest and ask for aid. He does so, and while there a messenger comes from the bandits, asking that the Padre accompany the messenger into the mountains to perform a marriage ceremony. The Padre hits upon a plan whereby they can rescue Ramona, and he gives Jose a priest's robe and they arm themselves. They then accompany the messenger to the stronghold of the bandits. As the ceremony is about to be performed, the Padre and Jose suddenly draw the guns and overpower the two bandits and bind them. The Padre and Ramona then leave the camp, she dressed as a priest, and go for aid for Jose. They take two of the bandits' horses and start on a wild ride for the city. Arriving there, they go for the cavalry, which immediately sets out for the rendezvous. They surprise the bandits and capture the entire band. As they are led away, Jose and Ramona kneel and receive the blessing of the Padre.

LUX

A MIGHTY HUNTER (May 16).—A hunter recounts his adventures to his admiring sweetheart. That day a wild beast makes a raid upon a farm and the hunter is called upon to prove what he can do. Discretion overpowers him and he decides that he is safer in bed than waiting for the animal. The wonderful way in which he hunts the lion shows him to be a mighty hunter, but a mightier ————!

On the same reel:

PAT MOVES IN DIPLOMATIC CIRCLES—This is an amusing comedy, showing the alarming results caused by a mistake on the part of some representatives of the French government who are sent to meet the new ambassador of Illyria. The ambassador postpones his departure, and Pat, who is traveling by the train which he should have taken, is mistaken for the illustrious person. His behavior is not becoming to an ambassador, and leads to a serious rupture in the diplomatic relations between France and Illyria.

ESSANAY

THE STORY THE DESERT TOLD— One who has not traveled across a desert barely realizes what a trying and dangerous thing it is. The sheriff of Desert Valley, California, receives a letter from Mrs. Tom Decker, requesting the former to send Marjorie Day to her. A volunteer is called for, to risk his life in escorting the four-year-old child across the sandy plain. John Hartley steps forward and promises to protect the child with his life. That day Bill Barratt, an outlaw, is arrested and lodged in jail for the murder of Jim Ellis' child. That night the sheriff is informed that the men of the village are going to lynch Barratt. Sheriff Mackley handcuffs the prisoner, places him on a horse and takes him into the desert for safe keeping. In the meantime, John Hartley's mule succumbs to the heat. Being out of water, he tells Marorie he will go for some and return shortly. Hearing a child's cry, Mackley and his prisoner are quick to find the thirsty infant. Mackley returns to his horse, which had been left a few rods away, only to discover that the animal had galloped off. Without water, they are in a hopeless condition. Jim Barratt promises to guard the wagon until the sheriff can return to town, where he takes the almost lifeless form of the young child. When the men returned to the deserted wagon, they discovered the lifeless form of the outlaw, Jim Barratt, who had kept his promise.

AMERICAN

ANGEL OF THE CANYONS (May 12).—Jim Beverley was an untrained, natural artist. His sweetheart, Madge, often visited him while at work in the mountains, but never completely sympathized with his work. She wanted his whole love and attention.

Bill Hogan was much beloved by pretty Carrie, but he, being also in love with Madge, ignored her. Bill felt that Jim's ability to paint was what had won Madge's heart.

In a cosy part of the canyon lived charming Pauline, commonly called "The Angel of the Canyon," because of her many good deeds for the villagers. One morning she saw the artist at work, with pretty Madge gazing petulantly at his canvas. She saw them quarrel, Madge fly toward the house and Jim turn angrily toward his work. Then she stepped up close beside him, and he, thinking it Madge, took up her hand and kissed it without looking up from his work. Even an angel can have human feelings, and the angel in this case found a special delight in the unexpected kiss. When Jim, in confusion, apologized, it seemed a desecration. But Madge, watching from a distance, thought otherwise.

Several days later the angel, walking in the direction of the artist's glen, found and took away his canvas. Three weeks later he called upon her and found a check for $100 awaiting him and a brand-new box for his equipment. Delighted, he showed his treasures to Madge, who only pouted and then cried. Meanwhile Bill Hogan nursed a grudge in secret.

A day came when the angel, strolling through the woods, saw a terrific fist fight between Bill Hogan and Jim. Beside them stood Madge and Carrie, vainly trying to separate them. Then came the angel's moment of renunciation. She had grown to love Jim, and had to fight herself to repress the desire to go away. But her better nature conquered. She separated the combatants, gave Jim to Madge and pacified the troublous Bill. She strolled with Bill into the forest, and when she returned he went willingly to the happy Carrie.

THE KISS (April 15).—Old man Hathaway was a trapper and lived with his only daughter in the mountains. Pretty Claudine often went forth to visit the traps with him, and one day, when so hound, they saw a youth kiss a maiden affecionately. Seeing a chance for an object lesson, the old trapper sagely shook his head, saying, "My child, such kisses are poison. Guard against them."

Claudine had a herd of goats which she tended carefully, and one day, sitting on a rock, with them scampering about her, she made so pretty a picture that Ralph Walters, a young artist from the city, asked her to pose for him. They arranged an engagement for the following day. He posed her prettily and then, overcome by her beauty, impulsively kissed her upturned, inquiring lips. Claudine fled in shame. From a distance she watched him, debating her father's advice. Then, plucking a handful of poison berries, she went again to him. He ate them gladly. In a few moments he fell deathly sick across the rock, and Claudine ran, badly scared, to her father.

Together they rescued the sick artist and took him home. He recovered, and one day, while away with her father, she told him her reason for giving him the poison berries. Furious at the insult offered his daughter, the aged trapper hurried back, gave Ralph a gun, and offered him a chance for his life. Overcome by feeling, Claudine stepped in between them and spared Ralph from the deadly hatred of the old man. A few minutes later Ralph was picking his way through the boulders, pondering upon the quaintness of backwoods ways and the ease with which an innocent expression of admiration was transformed into an excuse to kill.

THE PAST FORGIVEN (May 9).—Margaret Reeves, an unfortunate girl who has fallen into the clutches of a white slaver, is induced by a Salvation Army rescue worker to give up her present life and make a new beginning. She decided to redeem herself in the new West as a helper to an overworked wife on a big cattle range out West. She meets the foreman of the range, a typical Western man, unused to the ways of woman and having pure ideals of womanhood. Attracted by Margaret's reserve, he falls in love and tries to win the girl as his wife. A conflict between conscience and love rages in the girl's mind and love wins. She pushes the past far behind her and takes a chance for happiness. Secure in her Western home, her joy reaches its zenith when their child is placed in the foreman's arms. The first jar to her happiness comes when she meets the keeper of the dance hall. She pleads with him, for the child's sake, to keep her secret and leave her secure in an honest man's home. Pretty faces being scarce, the man follows her home and forces his attentions on the terrified girl. The foreman, entering unexpectedly, sees him and hurls the intruder against the wall, and the disgruntled man sneers his revenge to the husband, leaving a shattered faith and a wrecked home. The husband, unforgiving, drives the shrinking wife from his hearth, and, snatching their baby girl from its cradle, swears she will never follow in her mother's footsteps. Margaret, bereft of home and child, wanders into the open and encounters a young Indian mother playing with her papoose. The desolate woman, hungering for her own baby, caresses and croons over the Indian child and so wins the gentle young squaw's heart that she takes Margaret home to her people. In her simple way, the Indian wife sees the white woman is in great trouble and draws the story from her. She determines that Margaret's baby shall soon rest in its mother's arms. Stealing away from the camp, she locates the home where the lonely man mourns over the motherless babe in its cradle, and in her tragic, broken English shows the husband his cruelty in keeping the child from its mother. With barbaric gestures she depicts Margaret's remorse, and, seeing the man's face softening, she gently places the sleeping child in his arms and leads him, with his precious burden, to the camp which shelters a bruised and stricken woman.

THE HEART THAT SEES (May 15).—King is the greatest optician in New York, and his delicate operations upon the eye have made his name famous, while his broad charity to all who have come to him in need has made his memory dear to many suffering hearts. While a child he suffered an accident that deformed him for life and left him to bear forever the curious glances and pity of all beholders. The famous oculist and philanthropist is a hunchback and moves always with bowed head, stiffened neck and halting stride. He is almost abnormally sensitive of his deformity and has never known a woman's love save his mother's. Fate throws him across the path of another sufferer from Nature's grim jests—a poor blind girl—and her younger brother, who are waging a desperate battle for existence. King takes them to his home and his mother offers them a home and protection. The girl is later taught by the oculist how to operate a typewriter by touch, and thus assists him. He believes her to be unaware of his deformity, for he has instructed all to keep from her the knowledge of it, but coming upon him asleep in his easy chair, with the acuteness of touch of the blind, she finds out his secret. Nevertheless, love grows up between them and, trusting because of her blindness that she will never be able to see him, they become engaged. Later he finds her condition so improved that an operation for the restoration of her sight is possible, and after a bitter struggle he operates upon her and restores her sight, determining to leave for Europe when the bandages are taken from her eyes, that she may never see the man she has learned to love in the dark. His departure is delayed by her brother and he learns from the girl that she has always known of his deformity, and loved him nevertheless, and as he takes her in his arms he realizes that it is the heart that sees best.

BILLY'S ADVENTURE (May 13).—Violet Horner is in love with Billy Quirk. Her father dislikes Bill and tells this to Bill's father. Incensed at this, the elder Quirk bets Vi's dad that he (Horner) will beg Bill to marry his daughter. Horner takes the bet.

To keep Vi away from Billy, she is sent to boarding school. Bill, disguised as a girl, gets into the same school and nearly wrecks it. The ruse is discovered by the principal. Billy persuades Vi to elope with him, and while running to the parson's they bump into her father, who calls an officer, but Bill gives the cop the slip.

Later Mr. Horner gets a letter from his old friend, Captain Spar, who has settled in the Canary Islands, telling that his son, the prince, will call. Vi steals this letter and shows it to Billy, who conceives the idea of hiring a couple of tramps. He makes them up as Zulu slaves and himself as the young savage prince. In this disguise they go to the Horner home, where they get dad's goat.

Pa Horner phones to Billy's dad to have Billy come over and marry Vi and collect the wager, which the young folks may have as a wedding present.

A FAIR EXCHANGE, Two Reels (May 16).—A rich young man is attached to his father's stenographer, who is insincere and heartless. Knowing her character, the father objects, disowning his son when he persists in his attentions to the girl.

In the grip of poverty the girl's true nature is disclosed and the gentleness and goodness of her sister is revealed. The insincere girl finally rejects her lover, who is aided by the better sister.

Father and son are reconciled, the latter realizing that he has chosen the wrong sister.

An embezzling clerk in the father's employ finds favor with the fickle girl and an elopement is arranged. Through an error, the elopers carry away a suitcase containing embroidering. The other case, containing the embezzled funds, is unknowingly restored to the rightful owner by the sincere sister.

"101 BISON"

THE TOLL OF WAR, Three-Reel (May 13).—Edith Eldridge, daughter of Colonel Eldridge, disguises herself as a boy to enlist with her two brothers in the Confederate army. She is found out and rejected.

Federal raiders ransack and burn the Eldridge home and kill Edith's father. Enos and Mammy, faithful slaves, save Edith's life.

To avenge the murder, Edith turns spy for the Confederate cause. With Enos she goes through the swamps to the headquarters of Confederate General Johnson. He pleads with her to give up her perilous undertaking, but she insists. So General Johnson gives her instructions and bids her Godspeed. Entering the Union lines, she arrives alone near the quarters of Lieutenant Phillips. She feigns illness, and the officer carries the seemingly prostrate girl to quarters, where he confides her to the wife of an officer. Edith's story is plausible, and she is allowed to remain.

Slowly but surely Lieutenant Phillips is falling in love with her. Enos is captured. Edith, now on intimate terms with the officers, aids him to get work around the quarters. Edith plans to secure the outline map of the Union fortifications intrusted to Lieutenant Phillips. By betraying his faith she secures them and makes her escape. She is pursued and wounded, but reaches the Confederate lines.

As a result of the information, the Confederates make an immediate attack. During the battle Edith sees both of her brothers fall and witnesses the danger of the Confederate ammunition wagons. Climbing into the seat of an ammunition wagon the driver of which had been shot, she attempts to cross the stream with it. The Confederates are repulsed, and Lieutenant Phillips captures Edith, takes her back to the Union camp a prisoner. Enos learns she will meet the fate of a spy. The old negro decides to appeal to President Lincoln. He steals away in the night.

Upon reaching Washington, Enos is first denied admittance to the White House, but on the following day is allowed to plead for the life of his massa's lady girl. His story touches Lincoln's heart, and the President wires General Thomas to suspend execution and send the girl to him. The message arrives in the nick of time, and Lieutenant Phillips is selected to take the prisoner to Washington.

Edith is hitter in her prejudice and heaps invectives on the President's head when she comes before him. Nevertheless, he pardons her.

She is taken away by Lieutenant Phillips, who tells her to go where she will, as she is free.

Edith remains in Washington, and Enos becomes man of all work at her boarding place. She works as a seamstress. She treasures a picture given her many months before by Lieutenant Phillips. Wise old Enos brings her a newspaper in which she reads an article concerning the President's plans to attend Ford's theatre and witness the performance of "Our American Cousin." The article states that Captain Phillips, in company with General Grant and his wife, are expected as the President's guests. Edith, hoping that the Phillips mentioned is her Northern lover, scrapes her savings together and, with the aid of Enos' coppers, attends the play.

All others cheer when the presidential party enters the box. Edith sees Lieutenant Phillips with President Lincoln, his wife and party. During the progress of the play she watches the box intently. She sees a man glide along toward the President. Simultaneously with her scream a shot is fired. President Lincoln's head falls quietly on his breast and his arms to his sides.

In the uproar that follows, Edith hastens out and to her lodgings, where the wounded President is brought and placed in Edith's bed. She administers sympathy and what aid she can. Captain Phillips assists Mrs. Lincoln from the room and turns her over to a woman. He recognizes her. It is Edith. Back in the room with the dying man, they stand with clasped hands as Abraham Lincoln closes his eyes on this earthly world.

Some time later Enos apprises Mammy that he is back and well, and with him are Mr. and Mrs. Marshall Phillips.

HAWAIIAN LOVE (May 12).—A native girl, Lahela, is beloved by Kalike. She suffers his embraces and he is content. The captain of a small trading vessel visits the planter and sees the girl, who appeals to him. He makes love to her and hypnotizes her with promises. She listens and finally agrees to marry him. They go to a clergyman and the ceremony is performed. The small boat puts to sea and poor Kalike is broken-hearted. He gradually settles down to his business as a wandering beach comber, but wanders away from the scenes he loved so well.

The captain abuses his crew and ill treats the poor girl he married. The crew decide to scuttle the ship and chop a hole in the bottom. They get away in the only boat.

The boat sinks, and the captain, sobered, and his wife get away on some wreckage. They come to the beach and the wretched man seeks out a Chinese liquor keeper. He is tired of the woman, and trades her for money to the Chinaman. She is seen by her old lover, who comes up and, after a struggle with the Chinaman, he strangles him and takes the girl away. His mind is full of murder and he seeks out the captain and finds him by the beach. The captain sees him and staggers back, thinking he sees an avenging angel. He falls over a cliff, paving the way for the happiness of Lahela and Kalike.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE (May 16).—Tom Kirby and Buck Edwards are partners in their mining claims. Both have been up against it. Tom makes a big strike and he suggests that Buck finish making the monuments, so that he may be able to go and record the claims as quickly as possible. Tom gets his horse and, as he is about to mount, the demon of avarice enters Buck's soul and he shoots at his partner and wounds him. Buck thinks he is dead and, going over to the country town, he records the claims and goes to the saloon. When questioned, he states that Tom shot himself in despair before the strike. He proposes to the saloon keeper's daughter and is accepted.

Tom pulls himself together and, with his finger dipped in his own blood writes on the horse's side, "My partner killed me." The horse is found at a water hole. Tom is found, revived and taken home.

Buck confesses and is taken to the desert and left there. "An eye for an eye."

FRONTIER

BETTY'S BANDIT (May 17).—Ranch girls, as well as all other girls, have a right to birthdays and are pleased to have them up to a certain age; then they forget. They have also a right, as stories go, to look up a sweetheart in the form of a handsome cowhand, if their tastes run that way, and Christians should not object; that is, as we see it.

The story opens with the ranch boys all ready with their presents for Betty, the pretty eighteen-year-old daughter of Jim and Mary Brandt. Each and every one of the boys come cheerfully forward with their presents, expecting to gain in her eyes. There is always a villain, or the story wouldn't be worth while.

The villain of our story has the long, flowing mustache, figure and dress of the brigand. His bump of ego is enlarged to a remarkable degree and he feels sure there is nothing to it and he is going to win out in a walk in the affections of Betty. He is the last to hand his present in to Betty, and as he is the joke of the other cowboys, they leave him to his fate, knowing full well Betty will get his goat in a hurry, which she does, she sending him about his business a wiser man, but with a spirit of revenge lurking in his brain, which is none too evenly balanced, and he decides to watch for an opportunity to get square.

It comes a little bit later on, when he finds that Betty is really in love with Joe Franz, the most bashful and best-looking cowboy on the range. Betty makes love to Joe. His bashfulness is misunderstood by Betty and she leaves him and visits the padre and pours out her tale of woe; the parde comforts her, and she goes home, feeling much better and that somehow things will come out all right. She decides to flirt desperately with the villain, in the hope of arousing Joe's jealousy. This she accomplishes with a degree of nicety. Joe gets a heart stroke and beats it with a hop, skip and jump to the padre. The padre sees the situation and decides it will be a good plan to turn the joke on Betty.

Arrangements are made whereby Joe will kidnap Betty in a disguise resembling the villain, drag her to a cave in the rocks, where the padre will be in waiting to perform the marriage ceremony. This is accomplished successfully. After the ceremony Betty is allowed to mount her horse, after being told that if she reveals the secret, horrible punishments will come to her. Betty, feeling sure that she has been compelled to marry the villain and being fearful that his threats will be carried out, tries to keep her secret; but she, like all women, could not keep her secret and her chum, a neighboring ranchman's daughter, is told the heroine's tale while shivers are in evidence.

The villain overhears the story and decides he will try to make Betty think it really was he, and thereby possibly be able to gain possession of Betty. Joe is now a watchful husband and does not care to lose his Betty on so short an acquaintance. Betty receives a note from the villain to meet him at the crossroads. She, in fear, starts to comply with his request. Joe is on the job, and just at the psychological moment rushes up and protects Betty. The villain received his just dues Joe's bashfulness suddenly vanishes and there is a happy reunion at the home, with Joe doing most of the love-making. The villain witnesses his rival's happiness. We see him tearing his hair and mustache out by the roots.

THE TARANTULA (May 16).—A fascinating Spanish-Mexican girl, known as the Tarantula, because of her deadly influence over men, is coolly polishing the blade of a stiletto with which she has just killed a lover she was tired of, her new lover being a young Mexican boy whose beauty and innocence appeals to her.

An American engineer rides into the camp and reports the finding of the body of a man who has been stabbed, but in this wild country the news is received with indifference, and the Tarantula fears nothing and laughingly plays her guitar. An old man in the camp warns the American of the evil this woman does and tells him she is guilty of the murder and points out the young Mexican boy as the latest victim.

The American, who is strong and cannot help admiring the beauty of this girl, makes up his mind to resist her, while she, noticing him, tries to catch his eye. He refuses to look, knowing if he does he is lost. He makes his way in to the bar, where he meets the Mexican boy. They both take a great fancy to each other, and the American, who is on his way East, promises to take the boy with him. In the meantime the small encampment has a long journey to make across the desert.

The boy tells of his love for the Tarantula and, taking the American outside, introduces him, but the American refuses to meet her eye. She laughs at him and, picking a flower, offers it to him, but he refuses it. She laughs at him and puts it down his shirt, which is open at the neck.

In a tent in the desert the Tarantula is preparing the evening meal and the American walks in. He has made up his mind to meet her eyes and defy her. He does so and she cannot meet his, but seems to shrivel up. For the first time she is conquered by a man. She laughs and rushes out of the tent, while he wipes the great drops of perspiration from his head, showing the strain he has been under.

She is now tired of the Mexican boy Jose and begins to hate him, and thinks if he is out of the way she can win the American engineer. That night she goes out on the desert to look for a tarantula, she having decided to kill him by hiding one of these deadly insects in his bed. She finds one and returns to the encampment and, placing it in his pillow, creeps to her own bed behind a desert bush. Jose has been in the habit of tending to her comfort and that night it is cold and, taking the thick blanket off his own bed, he tenderly puts it on hers, and finding his pillow is a little softer than hers, he changes it, quite innocent of the fact that she has placed a tarantula there, whose bite is instant death.

They retire for the night, when the camp is awakened by a scream, and the Tarantula appears with a wound on her breast where she has been bitten by the tarantula she intended should kill Jose. She goes to speak, but falls dead between Jose and the American. Jose throws himself on the ground and, drawing a stiletto, attempts to kill himself, but the American prevents him.

The American takes the flower she has put down his neck and slowly tears it to pieces and, turning to Jose, points to the east. He packs up his kit and, telling Jose to come with him and start life afresh in the East, looks again at the flower on the ground and almost breaks down, but they start off across the desert.

THE PROPERTY MAN.—A many-sided individual in the plant of the Selig Polyscope Company, in Chicago, is Johnnie Langmack, the peripatetic property man. It has often been opined that if any department of the famed British Museum were to report itself "shy," Johnnie could fill it to overflowing on reasonably short notice. Until a few weeks ago the vehicle exhibit in the Selig "yard" was even larger and quite as startling in its variety of architecture as that strange section in the government patent office. Carloads of conveyances, ranging all the way from an arctic palanquin to a wonderful old "one-hoss chaise," were recently sent to the spacious Selig plant in Los Angeles, yet there still remains in the Chicago yard a complete fire department and several dozen strange "rigs" of picturesque design. Last Winter, when one of the Selig companies returned from Florida, Supt. Tom Persons brought back with him a frisky pair of alligators. They were given the freedom of the baggage car on the returning special. When the car arrived in Chicago and was being unloaded the alligators were discovered frozen stiff. Careless hands were just about to throw them away when Johnnie, who is much opposed to discarding anything that looks like a prop, carried the cadavers to the plant and laid them out in the property room, preparatory to skinning and stuffing them. The next morning Johnnie discovered that his frozen reptiles had disappeared, but a few days later, guided by a peculiar singing sound, he located the alligators behind the hot air register. They had thawed out and were attempting to lure down English sparrows with their song, preparatory to feasting upon them. Johnnie 'lows that one never can tell what will happen around a picture plant.

GREAT NORTHERN

HER FIRST LOVE AFFAIR (May 10).—Amelia Barlow was a charming young girl who had reached the age when, in fact, she was neither girl nor woman. She wore braids on Monday, Marcel waves on Tuesday, wore short skirts on Wednesday and long frocks on Thursday. But she was charming withal, and spent most of her spare time reading "Along the River" and other stories of love and romance. Her fond parents were tolerant and granted her every wish until one Mr. Henry made his appearance and announced that he had just passed his examinations and was anxious to make Amelia his wife. The elder Barlows were willing, but Amelia laughed at her suitor when he proposed. He was of the weak-kneed type and wore glasses. Mr. Barlow then decided to punish his daughter by compelling her to serve as a clerk in his office, but Dan Cupid came on the job at the same time. Amelia had been on the job but three days when she fell in love with Tom, one of the junior clerks. The sentiment is mutual and the head accountant is horrified one afternoon to find Amelia and Tom in each other's embrace. The news is told to Papa Barlow and it is then decided that the young girl must be sent to a friend who maintains a home in the country. But Tom hears of this plan and manages to get a note to his lady love informing her that he will be on the same train that is to carry her into temporary exile. Mr. and Mrs. Barlow are bidding fond farewells to their daughter at the depot, when Tom hurries unseen to the coach ahead and the train departs. The Barlows are the unsuspecting parties to an up-to-date elopement. When the train reaches the first stopping place Amelia and Tom alight and the nearest parson is called upon to perform the marriage ceremony. Then a telegram is sent to Papa Barlow and we are led to believe that he will grant the usual parental blessing.

MAJESTIC

THE CHILDREN OF ST. ANNE, Two-Reel (May 6).—To the parish of St. Louis, on Bayou Lombre, comes a starving boy who has run away from a brutal father. The lad goes to sleep at the foot of St. Anne's shrine. Marie, a young girl, and her mother return from town, where they have been to sell water lilies and the lace the Creoles make. Her mother questions him, but he refuses to tell where he comes from. Marie gives him the remains of the food which they have taken to the city with them. The sight of the boy's wolfish hunger incites the mother's pity. She takes him home and feeds him. He faints with exhaustion when he tries to leave. He is allowed to stay all night. During the night the mother hears Marie praying to a picture of St. Anne, the friend of the poor and homeless, to protect the boy. Moved by this, the mother adopts Jacques.

Years pass. Jacques and Marie are at love's Springtime. He carves a little St. Anne for her to hang around her neck, "to keep a maid from harm." An artist of wealth gets Jacques to pose for him. Jacques begs for some colors and paints Marie's picture. When the artist sees the promise of the picture and is shown the carved St. Anne, he realizes the boy's talent and takes him to the city.

Jacques attends the Art Students' League and studies sculpture. Gradually he forgets Marie and drifts into a life of dissipation and idleness. His work suffers and his patron casts him off in disgust. He sinks into desperate poverty, and meets a tramp, whom he tells of his longing for the old bayou. The tramp is going South for the Winter and suggests that Jacques go with him. While they are passing down a street to the ferry, an Italian whose business it is to make plaster casts of saints for churches is discharging a workman who has broken the cast of a statue. Jacques stops, hears the quarrel and sees work ahead. He tells the Italian he is a sculptor. He is employed and abandons the tramp, who proceeds on his way. Jacques makes a statuette of St. Anne which so pleases his employer that he puts it in the shop window.

Meanwhile, Marie, whose mother is dead, has never forgotten Jacques, for whom she prays to the saint. The tramp, now wandering through the South, comes to Bayou Lombre. Marie feeds him. He tells her he met a starving man from that parish in the city to which Jacques had gone. Marie's instinct tells her that it is Jacques. She sells her goods and gets the old cure to write this note: "This girl cannot speak English. Please take her to where in your city Jacques Le Blanc lives." The simple folk think this is quite enough, knowing nothing of the big towns.

Marie arrives in the city and, of course, is completely bewildered. People laugh when they read the note. She wanders into a bad street and a flashily dressed young man sees the note. He pretends to know Jacques and where he lives and gets her to go with him. On the way they pass a shop with the statue of St. Anne in the window. Marie thinks it is a shrine and kneels to it to ask the way out of her troubles. The young man tries to drag her away and, in doing so, tears her dress at the throat, revealing the carved St. Anne that Jacques had given her, "to keep a maid from harm." Marie realizes what the man is, fights and screams. The workmen run out of the shop, among them Jacques, who sees the St. Anne, recognizes Marie and saves her. Ambition and good fortune return to the children of St. Anne.

RELIANCE

A CRUEL SUSPICION (May 7).—Mr. Boyd, a very jealous husband, through a combination of circumstances, finds his wife talking to a good-looking bachelor named Perry. He forbids his wife to talk to the man again, but later, when she meets with an accident, Mr. Perry goes to her assistance and they are discovered in each other's company by the irate husband. He will listen to no explanation and orders his wife home. Later their child, a boy of four years, is taken suddenly ill during the evening, while the maid is out. The mother starts to go for remedies, and on her way to the drug store meets Perry, and in her anxiety for her sick boy, asks Perry to go to the drug store for her. He does so, and returns with the prescription and helps the wife in her care of the child. Mr. Boyd, who has been working late in the office, returns. The boy has just gone to sleep, and Perry is about to leave the house, when they hear Mr. Boyd returning. Perry and the wife remember Boyd's insane jealousy. The wife tells Perry to hide behind the curtain or he will be killed before she has a chance to explain. Perry does so. Boyd enters the room, notices Perry's stick, which he had left. The maid has been spending the evening with the policeman on the beat, who is escorting her home, and they arrive just in time to see Perry jump out of the window. The policeman grabs Perry and holds him. Meantime, the husband, who has looked about the room for some explanation of his wife's guilty looks, hears a commotion outside. He takes a gun and exits. The policeman tells Mr. Boyd that he caught Perry jumping out of the window. Boyd is sure now that his wife is untrue to him. He tells the policeman that he will deal with Perry, and under cover of the gun forces Perry back into the house to confront the guilty wife. There, when the wife pleads for Perry and tries to explain, he threatens to shoot them both.

Meantime, the druggist discovers that he has given laudanum in place of some other ingredient while mixing the medicine for the sick child. He starts on a run for the house, and arrives there just in time to prevent Boyd killing his wife and Perry, and they all turn to reviving the child. The husband now is willing to listen to an explanation, and begs Perry's pardon and his wife's forgiveness.

THANHOUSER

HER SISTER'S SECRET (May 6).—The famous specialist was grave as he gave his verdict. The patient must go to California if she wished to regain her health. The proposed trip to the land of perpetual Summer seemed a great treat to his youthful patient, but her older sister, who was to accompany her, realized fully the fight that had to be made before health was won back for the invalid.

In California the younger girl soon regained her strength, and she and her sister prospered on their little farm. Love came to the older girl in the person of a young, manly farmer. She cared for him, although she admitted it to no one, and as for him, one look into his eyes was enough, but she had "little sister" to consider, and gave him no opportunity to speak his mind.

The younger girl thought that the many presents of flowers and fruit which the farmer brought were intended for her alone, and, being of a very romantic temperament, mistook a passing fancy for the farmer for love. She told her secret to her sister, and the older girl, accustomed to making sacrifices for the younger, made the greatest one in her life when she refused the farmer's proposal of marriage. Then, in her diary, where she recorded the events of each day, she wrote that she had refused the man she loved, although it nearly broke her heart, because her little sister loved him.

"Big Sister" had gone on an errand to a nearby town when the younger girl accidentally found the diary, and curiosity led her to open it. She read the pathetic entry, realized the love which has prompted the sacrifice and resolved to be worthy of it. She went to the farmer and told him why he had been rejected, then, leaving a note of farewell to her sister, she took the train for the East and returned to her relatives.

As for the older girl, she did not refuse her lover a second time. She married him and they were very happy. And her sister in the East later met the man of her choice, and never regretted the action which had won her sister's respect and gratitude.

THE OTHER GIRL (May 9).—The annual Tournament of Roses at Pasadena, Cal., is participated in by many Summer visitors, who eagerly vie with one another for supremacy.

A young college man decided one year to compete, prepared his entry with care and arranged with his fiancee to be the driver. This young woman was of a jealous disposition, however, continually quarreled with the young man, and just before the hour set for the fete, declined to take charge of his chariot and left him apparently helpless. While he was wondering what he should do he saw a beautiful flower girl pass. She was a farmer's daughter and, with her mother, was bound for the city, hoping to sell posies to the merry-makers. The young man noted how attractive she was and on a sudden impulse urged her to drive his car. She demurred at first, but finally consented, much to his delight.

The "other girl" was angrier than ever, and broke her engagement. She expected that her finace would beg her pardon, but he took his dismissal in a matter of fact way and seemed quite cheerful about it. Then, like a latter-day prince, he started out to find his Cinderella, whose modesty and beauty had won his heart. They met at last and the girl was glad to see him, for she had dreamed of "a fairy prince," and the owner of the chariot of roses was the man whose face appeared in her dreams.

SOLAX

THE MAN IN THE SICK-ROOM (May 16).—Miriam Scott is loved by two men—Robert Henderson, only son of wealthy people, and Richard Blakely, a poor but ambitious young doctor. She admits she prefers Blakely, yet decides to marry Henderson for the home and social position he can give her. Blakely's failure to win Miriam makes him reckless. He starts gambling, gets in with a rough set who rob him, and finally becomes a thief.

Meanwhile Miriam marries Henderson, who gradually tires of her and neglects her. One evening Henderson quarrels with his wife and leaves the house for his club. Miriam is left with their sick baby, which grows worse and worse. Miriam becomes frightened, goes to another room to telephone for the doctor and is confronted by a masked burglar. Frightened, yet more alarmed for her baby's life, she tells him her troubles. He recognizes in Miriam his former sweetheart, but keeps masked. For auld lang syne, he treats her baby and saves its life. The mother, grateful, wishes to pay him. He refuses, takes off the mask and discloses Blakely. Explanation of his present position follows, but he denies knowledge of whose home he has entered. Meanwhile the police have followed Blakely's trail to the Henderson home. They demand admission and ask Miriam his whereabouts. She answers that no burglar has been there, and the officers withdraw satisfied. Miriam hastens back to Blakely, gives him a suit of her husband's clothes, slips money in his pocket and sends him away.

The husband returns repentant, hears the story, sees the baby now peacefully sleeping, realizes how badly he has treated his wife, and begs her forgiveness, which is granted.

THE CASE OF THE MISSING GIRL (May 7).—This is a burlesque detective story and is the fourth in the "Burstup Homes" series. Burstup is a character who is becoming very popular with the exhibitors and picture fans. Every one of the Burstup releases is a complete story. This Burstup case deals with the detective's adventures in trying to locate a girl who mysteriously disappears. The girl's parents, while they suspect that she has eloped, still, in order to avoid a scandal, keep the matter quiet and rely on the ingenuity and resourcefulness of Burstup.

Naturally the bum detective follows many wrong clues. The girl's powder and puff lead him in the wrong trail and into a bag of flour. Many other ludicrous accidents happen to him until he finally discovers the girl and her lover's hiding place. In order to get however, he has to contend with a big gang. He reduces them to submission by means of hypnotism; but before he gets away something happens and breaks his hypnotic spell and he is temporarily defeated. The hour of triumph comes later when he has himself smuggled into the gang's den inclosed in a life-sized frame. With one shot he kill the whole outfit and carries off the missing heiress.

VITAGRAPH

THE SEA MAIDEN (May 10).—Just after bidding a fond farewell to Stella Chapman, his sweetheart, Edmund Vance receives a telegram telling him that he has acquired a fortune. He rushes back to tell Stella of his good luck, but finds her in the arms of another man. Disgusted by her faithlessness, he demands the return of their engagement ring and immediately leaves her. Stella finds out about the fortune and realizes what she has lost. She determines to get back at him, and to this end seeks out Madeline Turner, a young and pretty girl who has recently lost her father in a very tragic manner. Mr. Turner had been involved by other business men in some underhanded stock transaction. Exposure had come and, as a result, he lost his money. The sudden loss of his fortune gave the old man a shock which he did not survive, leaving Madeline and her mother almost penniless. Stella tells Madeline that it was Edmund Vance who ruined her father and poisons her mind against him. Madeline agrees to win his love and then break his heart.

Edmund goes away to Catalina for a vacation, where the two girls follow him. Madeline, by prearrangement with Stella, makes it possible for Edmund to see her posing as a sea maiden, and he at once falls in love with her. She, very much against her will, also falls in love with him, but, nevertheless, when he proposes to her she accuses him of being the cause of her father's ruin and death. Later, Stella tells Edmund that she had lied to Madeline about him and gloats over the effect her disclosure produces. Madeline, overhearing the conversation, enters the room and faces Stella, who now sees that the game is up. Stella laughs scornfully and retires, calling them a pair of fools. Madeline, her heart torn with anguish that Edmund should know that she had been led to conspire against him, turns to depart, but is stopped by Edmund, who, understanding her position, forgives her and warmly clasps her to his heart.

URBAN-ECLIPSE—GEORGE KLEINE

THE WILL OF FATE (May 14).—Dick is in love with Anna, a neighbor's pretty daughter. Dick's father and Tony, the brother of Anna, both of a smugglers' band, quarrel and are separated by townspeople. The revenue officers for some time have been in search of Dick's father, and he is fatally shot upon being discovered by them. Anxious about his father's return, Dick and several of his companions set out to learn of his whereabouts. After a long search, he is found lifeless behind a crag of rocks. Dick's mother remembers his former quarrel and accuses Tony of the murder of her husband. A month passes, and although Dick and Anna still love each other, his mother will not consent to the marriage of her son to the sister of the man who caused the death of her husband. Dick becomes one of the smuggling band, and the hiding place of their goods is operated by Dick's mother. She receives a letter, telling her to leave the trap-door open that night, as Tony will arrive with a bale of lace. A diabolical revenge is formed in her mind, and that evening the trap-door is shut upon the supposed Tony. In the meantime, Dick had persuaded the smugglers to allow him to carry the goods to the hiding place, his motive being the seeing of his sweetheart. Therefore, Dick is the victim of his own mother's revenge, and when the trap-door is opened some time later, the catastrophe is revealed.

CINES—GEORGE KLEINE

WILLIE'S ALARM CLOCK (May 13).—Willie's attitude towards work causes the disgust of Gertrude's father, who disapproves of their marriage until Willie is satisfactorily employed. Gertrude secures a position for him in the office of her cousin, a banker, who believes Willie's services a doubtful investment. He is right. Willie, by his unpunctuality, soon arouses the ire of the banker; so much so that Gertrude learns of it. She presents her lover with an alarm clock, which, not being set right, interrupts his sleep. Willie's well-aimed boot knocks it from the table. The alarm is broken, and consequently he does not arrive at the office until late, when he is promptly discharged.

Willie receives an indifferent audience when again calling on his sweetheart, which immediately causes his repentance. By using every possible precaution, he wins the confidence of the banker and is taken on the pay-roll again and makes good.

Later Willie and Gertrude are married, and on their honeymoon the alarm clock again makes its appearance, only to wind up a most interesting comedy.

PATHE

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 19 (May 5).

THE ANT-LION.—The ant-lion is a very interesting little creature about a quarter of an inch long, whose principal occupation, as the name suggests, is the trapping of ants. It chooses a patch of soft sand on which to build the trap and then buries itself in it. By maneuvering underneath the sand, the ant-lion forms an imitation ant-hill, with a hole through the center. When the ant passes across the hill the sand slips beneath his feet and the more he struggles the deeper he goes, until the ant-lion feels the pang of hunger which prompts him to reach through the sand and make sure of his prey.

On the same reel:

THE CHATEAU OF BLOIS (France).—A castle high on the bank of a beautiful river. The chateau is an architectural masterpiece reminiscent of the days of royalty and replete with historic mementoes. An unusually fine scenic offering.

THE CROOKED BANKERS (May 7).—John W. Turnbull, a banker, and his partner, Paul Brower, after a hard struggle to avoid it, find themselves face to face with bankruptcy. An elderly man hurries into the office at this juncture and tenders $65,000 to the bankers, to be held in trust for his wife and daughter should anything happen to him on a journey he is about to undertake. Turnbull gives Jenkins, the depositor, a receipt for the money and the latter is leaving the office with it when he drops dead. Here is a strong temptation for the bankers. They succumb to it, take the receipt from the dead man's pocket and, under cover of darkness, leave his body in an unfrequented part of the city. They divide the spoils, and with his share Brower leaves town. Five years later he returns to Turnbull's office, broke and bent on blackmail. The natural sequence of events brings the plight of the women he has helped to rob home to Brower, an dthrough his mighty efforts Turnbull is forced to make restitution.

HER MOTHER'S AMBITION (May 8).—Nancy Hanford is loved by two men—Frank Merrill, a young man with prospects of success, and Harvey Dixon, a wealthy broker. Nancy loves Merrill, but does not love Dixon, and Nancy's younger sister, Marion, also loves Merrill. Mrs. Hanford, being ambitious to marry off both daughters to advantage, brings all her influence to bear to make Nancy marry Dixon, and after no little persuasion, Nancy consents to the sacrifice. A while later Frank falls in love with and marries Marion. Nancy's marriage is not a happy one, but when she finds that the man she loves has married her sister, she secretes the hunger in her heart and suffers on silently—a martyr to her mother's ambition.

MONTREAL, QUEBEC AND HALIFAX (May 9).—This film offers an opportunity to everyone to visit every place of interest in these three thriving cities of Canada. No country in the world has more scenes of historic interest and historic landmarks than this, and persons, by means of this film, may view as their leisure the monuments and landmarks in a more comprehensive manner than would be possible through a personal visit, with its resultant expenditure of much time and money.

On the same reel:

IN THE VALLEY OF VESUBIE (France).—The Vesubie River, rising in Italy at a height of 6,000 feet, winds its way through the Alps to France, and the spectators follow its course through a valley beautiful in black and white, but whose beauty is enhanced by the handsome coloring.

PUTTIN' IT OVER ON PAPA (May 10).—Papa Sinclair, a prosperous farmer and very headstrong, refuses to accept Jack Wilcox, an artist, as his son-in-law, so Bessie Sinclair and Jack elope. After the wedding, father is still obdurate, but Jack has a plan. Disguised as a farmhand, he secures a position on Papa's farm. The next day Bessie comes home with the story that Jack has deserted her. Papa says, "I told you so." Several times in the course of the day he nearly catches his daughter in the arms of the new farmhand. At a barn dance in the evening Papa introduces Jack to Bessie with the remark, "If you had married a man like that I would have been glad." The young folks laugh, Jack removes his disguise, and although Papa rants around for a while, he admits the joke is on him and gives the couple his blessing.

PILOT

THE CRUCIBLE OF LOVE (May 8).—Raphael Moore, a dramatist, has written a brilliant, masterly play, novel of theme and technically perfect. He submits it to Roth, the manager of a theatre, but it meets with no success. Louise Kent, an actress of reputation, working for Roth, meets Moore and asks him to show her his manuscript. She and her uncle, Mr. Marchand, a benign and astute old gentleman, go over the play very carefully, and Louise decides to put the play on, against the wishes of her manager, Roth. The play is put on, but meets with failure. As a work of art it is a triumph, but it lacks the prime quality—heart interest. The boy is a genius, but does not know life. His characters are chiseled from cold marble; he has not yet been awakened to his full capacity; he must be awakened; his genius must be refined in the crucible of affliction; he must be made to live and suffer, as all must who achieve great things. Louise is impressed and resolves to put the theory to the test. Raphael is made to believe that she is false to him—for they have become betrothed—and, with his soul in torture, he turns again to his abandoned art for solace, and writes a truly great play.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC., LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—John Rickards.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.
Assistant Business Representative—John Rickards.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 619
Office—133 Third Avenue.

You have read in a previous chat the story of the successful man—how he made pleasure out of hard work and reached the top rung of that tall ladder. The story of the ambitious and industrious gardener who kept an ever-watchful eye on his garden of pretty flowers to keep out those weeds that creep into the midst of his paradise to destroy all that was dear had played a good part and was indeed a good lesson to some picture operators, who thought it worth while and who were looking forward to success. This great country is a successful one because man worked hard to make it a success, and we hear endless talk about it. These talks vary from advice concerning men like Lincoln, who had little money, few books and few chances, but made the best use he could of them. Money does not start you on the road to success, if you lack the quality of industry, and often the few who may acquire ill-gotten gains in large measure are thought to be successful men. But they are not, and very soon they fall, owing to the lack of industry. The moving picture industry is a very good one, providing you have quality for it, and don't be mistaken by thinking, as many do think, that it is a fine get-rich-quick game, with little or no work. The moving picture operator has a great many things to contend with, and must travel a good distance on that long road to success. One particular thing I wish to mention, and it is the first and most important thing for the successful accomplishment of any undertaking, and that is self-denial. The picture machine operator of to-day must be a mechanic, and is paid a fair salary. He sacrifices the dearest thnigs in life; he knows no day or night. His work starts early in the day and lasts until midnight; thus he is deprived of any recreation, and, if a married man, he never has any time to spare for his family. The salary of an operator looks fair in the eyes of many, but when compared to salaries of other mechanics who do not sacrifice what the moving picture operator sacrifices, the amount is very small, and the moving picture operator is well worth double the salary he now receives. But how can these conditions be improved is a question many operators ask, and the answer is—successful organization. To make a real success of anything, you must have, first of all, industry—the faculty for hard work. That quality is greater than all others put together. Self-denial is especially a matter of self-education, but we will not talk on that subject yet. You must have an organization, and a good one, and it requires hard work, and also self-denial, before a successful organization can be completed.

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, is truly a successful organization, and one the operators of this city can be proud of. It is made up of conscientious and hard-working men who have sacrificed much for the welfare of their brother operators. The situation in New York City is critical, and no doubt it is known throughout the entire country. The fault with this situation lies in unsuccessful organization in the past. To-day we have a successful one, and it is up to you, brother operator, to assist yourself by assisting this organization. The most important thing in the line of self-denial is to not allow yourself to worry about what others think of you. Try to earn the approval of people who are worth while, and dismiss from your mind the opinion of the crowd that means nothing to you and will never do anything for you. If you desire to join Local No. 1, and do join this organization, don't worry over what some fellow of a different union may tell you or say about you. You are old enough to know what you are doing, and you are aware of the past and existing conditions in this city.

Certainly you must be willing to work hard for the success of the organization, and you must be ready to sacrifice things for the benefit of all mankind, just as our fathers did in the days of Lincoln, when there was a terrible war between two factions—the North and the South—and our fathers sacrificed much, that we might enjoy the fruits of their toil. This is your fight, brother operator, as much as anyone's else. Look back five years, in the days of disorganization, and speak truthfully of conditions which existed. You worked in a little two-by-two dungeon, got $10 to $14 per week—and if you got $14, you were one of a thousand. Organization has accomplished this—that you now earn $27 and more per week for less work and fewer hours, and have a half-decent workroom. The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York appeals to every operator in Greater New York to think seriously of his craft and conditions and the best way to elevate the industry. Don't forget that the only way to solve this problem is to become a member of this organization, which makes your work a pleasure, be your task ever so heavy a burden, for hard, industrious work is the only straight path toward success.

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, will hold its next regular meeting Monday, May 5, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street, New York. A full attendance is requested.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The Commissioners of the District have passed a ruling that no obstructing signs shall be placed on the walks before any amusement house. Some of the picture managers have made a nuisance of their posters. The bulk of the exhibitors, however, heartily endorse the ruling of the Commissioners.

The Kalorama Film Company has been organized in this city under the general management of Jack Rogerson, who has done considerable work on the "legitimate" stage and has appeared with the Biograph, Vitagraph and other film companies. Mr. Rogerson is the leading man and he is ably supported by a corps of actors and actresses who have had experience in the speaking and silent drama. These include Mary Randolph, Alice Bernard, James R. S. Dickens, Bret Brehman, Willis Rockwell, Edward Vernon, M. Hubart and others. The company works harmoniously and promises some good pictures.

The picture play now under preparation is entitled "In the Toils," dealing with the fortifications of the Panama Canal, with several big dramatic and exciting situations. Mr. George H. Palmer, for many years stage manager with Henry W. Savage's companies, is at present directing the production. There will also be another director culled from one of the big film companies now in the field.

The Kalorama Film Company has gotten down to real business at once, and with such an earnest and exacting manager as Mr. Rogerson, it has a splendid outlook. Both the manager and directors fully appreciate the exceptional opportunities that Washington presents for a film company and selected this city for its operations chiefly with that in view.

FOREIGN CONSULAR REPORTS

Theatre-Fire Prevention in Germany and France

(From Consul-General A. M. Thackara, Berlin)

The police regulations of the city of Berlin regarding the fire-prevention measures to be taken in theatres and other places where moving pictures are exhibited are exceedingly strict and carefully enforced.

According to the police regulations of September 30, 1907, the booth in which the projector is installed must be made of either sheet iron or sheet steel and the sides and floor lined with asbestos at least one-third of a centimeter (0.13 inch) thick. New police regulations are in course of preparation. I am informed unofficially that under the new provisions the booth must be constructed with double sheet iron or sheet steel walls, with an intervening air space. In no case would booths constructed of angle iron and covered with asbestos boards be permitted in this district.

Main Provisions of Police Regulations

A translation of the more important paragraphs of the 1907 Berlin police regulations for moving picture theatres follows:

Section 1. Whenever moving pictures are exhibited in theatres, assembly rooms, stores, tents, or other public places, and inflammable films are used, electric or calcium light must be employed for purposes of illumination. Gas for the production of a calcium light must either be taken from the city gas mains or made in a safe generating apparatus which complies with the law.

Sec. 2. The electric or calcium lamp must be placed in a sheet-iron or sheet-steel booth, of which the bottom and sides are lined with asbestos. So far as will not interfere with the operation of the apparatus, the air holes in the booth must be covered on the inside with wire gauze or similar material, so that lamp sparks may not escape.

Sec. 3. All electrical apparatus must be mounted on tables of uninflammable material, and must be provided with safety hoods of fireproof insulating material.

Sec. 4. When a limelight is used, only the so-called safety lamps, in which the gas mixture is effected just before ignition, or a mixture burner, in which the gas mixture is effected inside the burner, may be employed. With mixture burners a safety device of wire gauze or some similar contrivance must be so arranged as to prevent a back draft of the flame into the mixture chamber. There must also be metallic attachments on the saturator and on the mixture chamber, to which the safety device is fastened and to which the pipes (india-rubber hose) must be firmly attached. Oxygen may be stored only in steel cylinders or other metal containers. The use of rubber sacks is prohibited.

Limelight, Film Drums, Non-inflammable Hangings, Etc.

Sec. 5. When ether-benzine or gasoline limelight is used (for plants in places which can not obtain illuminating gas), the ether-benzine or gasoline fluid serving to feed the flame must be kept outside the lamp booth in a receptable which complies with the law. This receptacle (saturator) must be connected with the oxygen cylinder by good and well-attached rubber hose. The saturator must contain porous substances to absorb the volatile ether or gasoline. The saturator may be filled only in a room separate from that in which the production of the moving picture is to take place, and only by daylight or by the light of a non-explosive, artificial light. Ether, benzine or gasoline calcium lights may never be used in which the saturator is united with the burner or is attached to the inside of the lamp booth. The supply of ether, benzine, or gasoline must not be stored within the theatre. The quantity kept within the theatre may not exceed 2 kilos (4.4 pounds). It must be kept in a metal receptacle made safe against rust and the openings in which are provided with safety devices to prevent back drafts.

Sec. 6. The intense heat and light rays which pass through the lens must be shut out or weakened by safety shutters as soon as the film stops unwinding.

Sec. 7. The portion of the film which is at any moment between the light and the lens must be so isolated from the remainder of the film that, should it ignite by reason of the intense light rays passing through it, the fire will not extend to those portions of the film which have already passed by the film or are yet to pass.

Sec. 8. The film must be unrolled from a metal drum which is completely closed except for the exit opening for the film, and this opening must be so narrow that the entry of a flame is impossible.

Sec. 9. The apparatus, the lamp booth, and the lamps may not be used until they are tested under the inspection of a representative of the fire department or other competent judge, and are declared to be free from objection.

Sec. 10. The apparatus must be so set that no inflammable or flimsy stuff (paper and the like) is immediately over it. A non-inflammable cover must be kept beside the apparatus, to throw over it in case of fire; also a basin of water and a fire extinguisher.

Other Precautions

Sec. 11. The supply of films not actually in use must be kept in closed metal receptacles.

Sec. 12. Smoking is prohibited in the apparatus booth and in the vicinity of the films. If the apparatus booth is hung with curtains, these must be of a material not easily set on fire.

Sec. 13. The apparatus may be operated only by one who, after proving himself competent, has been licensed by the police. When electric or calcium light is used he must be well-informed as to the handling of the same.

Sec. 14. In the case of productions in theatres or halls which hold more than 500 persons, if the operation of the apparatus and the lighting of the theatre are not done by the same man, a signal device must be placed beside the apparatus in order that the man in charge of the house lighting may be apprised of an existing fire or other trouble and turn on the lights in the theatre.

Sec. 15. The apparatus must be so set up that the public can not come within reach of it. A safe exit must be provided for the operator of the apparatus; for the spectators there must be a sufficiently broad exit on the opposite side of the house from the apparatus.

Sec. 16. Exceptions to the above regulations may be made in cases in which other examined and approved special provisions are taken for safety. Special instructions given to owners of moving picture shows must be observed in like manner as the contents of this order.

A Non-inflammable Film

So far as I have been able to ascertain, there is no truly non-inflammable film manufactured in Berlin. There is, however, a film of acetycellulose whose makers (name obtainable from the Bureau of Manufactures) claim that it is waterproof like nitrocellulose films and otherwise similar to them, except that it is rather difficult of ignition and slow-burning when ignited. It is on this latter ground that the term "non-inflammable" is applied to it.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Lam Building Company will make alterations to the Plaza Theatre at Broad and Porter streets.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Kahn & Greenberg have purchased property at 1200 Girard avenue and will erect a moving picture theatre on same. Plans by Stuckert & Sloan.

Chicago, Ill.—Loop Theatre Company, $15,000, to operate theatres. S. Ruhstadt, J. Kaplin and others.

Madison, Wis.—Cozy Theatre Company, Marinette. Capital $2,500. Incorporators, J. K. Streight, W. P. Streight and others.

WITHSTANDS TORNADO and FLOOD

Perhaps you think it is not essential that your motion picture projector should have this qualification.

Messrs. Weaver and Finch did not think their machines would ever be tested so severely. You never can tell what is going to happen, so be prepared for the worst. To its other virtues we add this assurance of reliability.

Another reason why you should use Simplex Projectors:

Gentlemen:

As I have had a Simplex machine since last October it's about time I said something about it. Have given the machine a thorough trial before making any comments. It not only stands the test running pictures, but also stands a tornado. As you may have heard my theatre was destroyed by that awful tornado of March 23rd. Of all the bricks and timbers that fell on the machine nothing broke only the top magazine. The weight would have smashed any other machine. Am sorry I did not get a picture of the machine as it was after the storm, but had too much trouble to think of. I would not trade a Simplex for any other make going. You have them all beat a mile, as the saying goes. I have started to rebuild again so will have the machine in operation about the first of June. There was no one killed in the theatre as was advertised over the country.

Very truly yours,
(Signed) O. S. FINCH.

General Film Service

"Experience is the Best Teacher"

Without doubt one of the most remarkable unsolicited compliments ever paid a film company is the following letter written by an exhibitor in Texas, upon his return to General Film Service after trying for two months to get along with another service.

> "I announced last Saturday night that beginning on Monday I would show licensed pictures again, featuring G. M. Anderson, John Bunny, Lillian Walker and others that were well-known to my patrons. The applause that followed made me sit up and take notice. I am frank to confess that the worst thing I ever did in my life was to discontinue your service, but, believe me, as long as you give me anything like decent pictures I am with you. I had a better crowd on Monday night than I had any Monday night during the time I used the other service, and there wasn't anything special on in town either to bring the people out. They all came 'round with a satisfied smile and words of praise for the pictures. Many of them said 'We're glad you changed.' There is an old saying that 'Experience is the best teacher.' I have found it so."

The public knows what it wants and will patronize the theatres that use General Film Service. The experience of this one exhibitor proves that. Why not travel along the line of the least resistance and use it?

EDUCATIONAL FILMS

FIRST of all, I want to ask the question, What are Educational Films? People from all parts of the country are writing to know where they can get educational films, and so diverse are the ideas that I often wonder what they mean by the term "Educational Films." Educational films are not incongruous historical films of past events, brought up-to-date by directors who do not consider the simplest details for a correct reproduction of pageants, heroes, or ancient wars, depicted as being fought with Martini Henry and Lee Metford rifles. These rifles were not invented until the last decade of the 19th Century, and brought to perfection the first decade of the 20th. Nor did Robinson Crusoe shoot the cannibals with such a rifle as he carries in the scenes of the films, nor was he dressed in a pantomime costume of bearskins. These are not historical pictures, nor are they educational. "Quo Vadis" as a spectacular play, and other like pictures in the same category, are practically the last words in Cinematography, but they are not historical educational films in the proper sense of the word educational. They are magnificent, and as showing what the art has reached to-day are the quintessence of Cinematography.

There came into my office during the past two weeks several people having a desire to produce educational films, and to float companies for that purpose. When I got right down to rock foundation, I discovered that all they wanted to produce was some imaginary event of ancient days (which has already been staged and filmed, in more or less crude manner), their desire was to produce something superior to anything that has been staged up to the present. They had great ideas, but when I explained that these were not historical, or educational, they wondered what was the matter with such subjects and why they were not educational. I explained that every company in the country was trying to produce something of this type.

In my opinion, an educational subject must be strictly educational, such as the evolution of the bee, the flowers, the taking of subjects forming the curriculum of the grades in high school, or say from the seventh grade, grammar, through high school, to college and university; taking up the various chemical experiments, showing the amalgamation of various liquids and atoms, showing the life of bacteria, from microscopic and other standpoints. There are many such films on the market, and I wish all the films of this nature could be gotten together in one large center and distributed wholesale and broadcast throughout the land. There is a wonderful field for those already made, and for those to be produced. And also a great opening for a company to exemplify such ideas.

The company, or companies, or the promoters must get away from the idea that directors are needed to stage educational films, in cramped-up situations, with up-to-date actors and fashions. They are altogether wrong. Directors are not needed. It needs educationalists, it needs scientists, it needs men who have a full, complete, concrete idea of what an educational program really means, a program that shall appeal to the intellect of the well educated man and woman, as well as illustrate to the most illiterate, through the eye, the teachings desired to be conveyed.

In my advocacy of the educational film I have always had the highest ideals in my mind, a something far superior, far beyond the ordinary plane of the everyday moving picture, something that shall lift out of the rut of mediocre subjects the beautiful art of Cinematography. What I wish to see to-day is an amalgamation of all interests owning such subjects as I have outlined above, and the bringing before the public, and the educational authorities, such films manufactured that will be of real lasting benefit to the audiences. I have made mistakes in past days, not exactly through ignorance, but with the full desire to advance an art which can be made in every respect the superior to the cut and dried text books of the schools, and also to give knowledge to the general public. I have taken the stand that Cinematography should be absolutely free and untramelled, and I have worked for this with a pure sense and desire for the best interests of the industry, trying to advocate the best there is, to the elimination of all the chicanery and roguery throughout the industry.

I have been abused for the stand I have taken, I have been ridiculed in many ways, many lies have been written and spread abroad concerning my motives for this work, but I feel that the time is rapidly approaching when a direct forward move must be made, and a man who knows the business, and has its highest aims and aspirations at heart, will be selected to go forth from one end of the country to the other, explaining the principles and conditions to the highest educational authorities in America. This man must be fully equipped with the knowledge and the power there is in Cinematography. His aim and desire must not be the craving for somebody else's money, but he must have a true honest desire and a proper view, and conscientiously convey the greatness and the grandeur of the educational work that can be accomplished by united effort. The company, or companies, that exploit this scheme must not by any means be any of the present-day money-grabbing crowd, for for the sake of filthy lucre are selling their souls and perjuring themselves on the witness stands of our courts with a desire to over-reach their fellow men.

The company must come into the industry with clean hands, with an almost unlimited capital, with the pure desire (a philanthropic one, if need be), to spread truth as it can be shown. It should be willing to sacrifice the money end of the business for a time, to aid the future greatness the industry may bring forth.

It is this aim that I have had in mind ever since I wrote my first editorial in March, 1907, even to the present day, and in answer to my inquirers, I would say in the words spoken during the Civil War by Abraham Lincoln, the much abused and greatly beloved President of America, "If I were to read, much less answer, all the attacks made on me, this shop might as well be closed for any other business. I do the very best I know how—the very best I can; and I mean to keep on doing so until the end. If the end brings me out all right, what is said against me won't amount to anything. If the end brings me out wrong, ten angels swearing I was right would make no difference."

I have had this aim in mind, and through the Moving Picture News, in the editorials I have written in the past, this has been my highest ideal: to unite in one Universal Brotherhood, the highest elements in the industry, working to propagate a true, high-class educational program.

Alfred H. Saunders.

SECOND ANNUAL CONVENTION OF M. P. E. L. OF PENNSYLVANIA

The second annual state convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania will be held in the Continental Hotel, in Philadelphia, on May 27 and 28. Through the influence of Mr. Neff the Pennsylvania exhibitors have been able to secure the services of Mr. Clem Kerr, who will act as manager of the arrangements in general. Mr. Kerr has already achieved much prominence among the various branches of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Leagues throughout the country for his adaptability in organization as well as his managerial ability in handling these conventions. The phenomenal success of the convention at Dayton, Ohio, together with that of Columbus, Ohio, and other States, have secured for Mr. Kerr the plaudits of all who have seen his work. The national convention held in Chicago last year also owes much of its phenomenal success to his unceasing efforts and careful guidance.

The Pennsylvania convention points to be a most interesting one, owing to the fact that in this part of the United States the exhibitors have been contending for some time with many laws and orders enacted by civic authorities through their ignorance of conditions that has done much to stay the onward progress of this industry.

The Continental Hotel is one of the most ideally arranged hotels in the East to hold an affair of this kind, owing to its ample auditorium facilities. To one side of the room which will be used for the convention, and adjoining the same, will be a still larger room which will be artistically decorated and divided into booths for the display of the by-products of the motion picture industry.

The detail arrangements are in the hands of Mr. Clem Kerr, who will act as manager; Mr. E. Jefferies, who will be the general chairman, and Mr. J. Hesser Walraven, who will act as secretary of the convention. The comforts of the many out-of-town guests who will wish to attend will be attended to by a carefully selected entertainment committee headed by Mr. J. Weinrich and assisted by Mr. A. R. Cavanaugh and others, while the exhibits will be in charge of Messrs. Walter Steumpfig and John Greenbaum.

That the convention will be a royal success is already well evidenced by the many inquiries from picture play exhibitors, manufacturers, and also by the keen interest displayed by the Chamber of Commerce and civic authorities of Philadelphia.

Every exhibitor owes it to himself and his business to arrange his affairs so that he can spend both days at this convention, May 27 and 28. You'll learn many things of great interest to your business, and incidentally meet the finest and livest wire crowd of high-class Cinematography exponents you ever heard of. There will be no dull moments; every second of both days will be one grand affair after another. So, Mr. and Mrs. Exhibitor, arrange to be there, even if you have to close up your theatre to do so. You will never regret the trip and good time that will be accorded you and yours.

WEST VIRGINIA STATE BRANCH M. P. E. L. OF AMERICA HOLD ANNUAL CONVENTION IN WHEELING

The convention opened April 29th in the McLure Hotel. Nearly 100 delegates attended the opening meeting, and more came in after the meeting adjourned and registered for the remaining sessions.

Mayor H. L. Kirk delivered the address of welcome to the convention and in a few well-chosen words extended them the freedom of the city.

While delivering his words of welcome, the mayor paid high tribute to the picture men in the following words:

"No business man can do a community the service the motion picture men can do. They are the genuine missionaries of progress and they are fast breaking down old prejudices. They scatter the germs of progress wherever they go."

President Neff Replies

President Neff, of Cincinnati, replied to the mayor's address, congratulating the city of Wheeling on having a man for mayor who had so many progressive ideas.

He then told of the aims and objects of the organization. "The organization aims to improve the motion picture business and to eliminate all objectionable features," he said, and stated that the organization was not formed until there was a need for it. To propagate brotherly feeling and friendship among the exhibitors as well as to afford them protection, he said, were two of the main objects of the organization. "But," he continued, "we want to educate the people, so they will realize the aims of Cinematography. We are striving to uplift and thereby convert all who oppose us. We all realize that it was not so long ago that thousands believed in witchcraft, and that superstition has been practically overcome. The moving pictures mean the advance of civilization, and it is the cleanest amusement on earth. The moving picture theatres, next to the press, are the greatest power for good or evil in the world. Every 24 hours in the United States 36,000,000 people visit the moving picture shows, and in the State of Ohio alone 1,416,000 visit the shows in that period of time. We are striving for more educational pictures and the elimination of the suggestive. The motion picture industry has killed the yellow back novel. The writers of these novels themselves admit this. A year ago there were 136 writers devoting all their time to writing sensational stories for the nickel publications sold to the youth of the land. To-day there are but ten.

"One thing I myself strenuously object to, and which the members of the organization should, is the showing of pictures in which actors and actresses are smoking cigarettes. If the actors want to smoke, let them do it off the stage. The motion picture industry has carried the wonders of the world to the masses, and has been a godsend to all classes.

"There are too many going into the business. It takes 500 paid admissions to a picture show to pass $25 into the box office, and out of this amount must be paid the expenses of operating the show. The public is mistaken about the amount of money in the picture business.

"There are 200,000 people engaged in the moving picture industry in this country, and still we have never had a law passed favorable to us. There have been many against us, but none for us. All we ask is a square deal. We do not ask for favorable legislation, neither do we want any unfavorable."

He then complimented Mayor Kirk on his address and stated that in all the addresses of welcome he had heard delivered to motion picture conventions, that none of the speakers had looked at the picture business in a true light, as Mayor Kirk had done.

Following this address adjournment was taken and the delegates retired to the ground floor grill of the McLure, where musical instruments, moving picture machines and like supplies for picture houses were being exhibited. The exhibit was one of the most comprehensive ever shown in this section, and was open to the general public.

The following officers, delegates and alternates were elected Wednesday, April 30th:

Alternates: C. W. Perrine, Frank McCray, J. B. Cotts, Jas. Velas, John Papaulias, O. F. Langworthy.

On the night of April 30th a big banquet was given. Many distinguished gentlemen were present. Among them were mayor of Wheeling, mayor of Bellaire, Ohio; mayor of Bridgeport, and National President M. A. Neff and several other efficient gentlemen, who delivered speeches.

NOTICE

President Neff would be very much pleased to hear from a few live, wide-awake exhibitors in the following States: Arizona, Georgia, Idaho, Montana, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, Vermont and Wyoming.

All contributions for the members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League who have suffered by reason of the flood or tornado must be in by May 14, 1913.

The receipts on Exhibitors' Day, April 8th, contributed by Cincinnati Local, No. 2, of the M. P. E. L. of America, amounted to a little over one hundred dollars. Owing to the fact that on April 8th a large number of theatres in Cincinnati were under water, and that the rain poured down all day and night of April 8th, hence the small amount of a little more than one hundred dollars, which was sent in to the local treasurer, Otto Luedeking, who has sent a check for fifty dollars to C. M. Christenson for the National League and fifty dollars to W. R. Wilson for the Ohio State branch, No. 1. Although the amount seems very small under the circumstances, Cincinnati contributions would have been four or five times that amount under favorable circumstances.

A. C. Dingelstedt, the newly elected president of Cincinnati local branch No. 2, through his hustling ability is doing great work for the local.

EXPOSITION NOTES

Although a large number of scenarios have been received at the offices of the Exposition Committee, none of them are suitable for the purpose. It seems that it is not understood that this scenario must be not only suitable for either a man or a woman, single, but it must be in one scene and not take more than five minutes in acting. It is desirous of having it as funny as possible, making it portray the different emotions such as grief, sadness, surprise, fear, anger, eagerness and joy in a comical way. Although it is to be acted by only one person, a messenger boy or a telephone may be used to bring about the different emotions. Those desirous of competing for the $25 prize offered for this scenario may send their offerings to the secretary of the First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, second floor of the German Bank Building, Fourth avenue and Fourteenth street, New York City. The contest will not close until the first of June.

As the time gets nearer for the opening of this first big International Motion Picture Exposition there is more and more interest shown in it. Nearly all the large manufacturers are now arranging their exhibits. Early this week a diagram of the platform covering, back, rails and sign to be furnished by the International Exposition, as called for in the contracts for space, was sent to all those who have taken space. Any one else wishing to receive a diagram may obtain it from the secretary. This diagram will be of great assistance to those exhibitors who are not planning for a special booth. For those who are the G. H. Masten Realty Co., 103 Park avenue, have designed some very attractive booths, which they will submit for approval. This company will do the official decorating of the New Grand Central Palace for the show.

Several of those manufacturers who took space several months ago have found that the space contracted for will not prove large enough, so more space has been taken. Notably in this respect is the Nicholas Power Company, who found out in time that four hundred square feet were not enough, so four hundred more were added. The Power's exhibit is likely to be a regular show in itself.

The Manhattan Slide Company have doubled their original space, as have the G. H. Masten Realty Company. Several other concerns are planning for more space, which will about close up the main floor.

Some very desirable space may be had on the mezzanine floor, on which the model theatres will be located. Work has commenced in these theatres, so that they will be all ready by the first of July.

THE JAPANESE DAGGER

The Japanese Dagger, the next Kleine-Eclipse production, will be released May 12, 1913. It is a strong two-reel melodrama, with a live theme, involving love, jealousy and superstition.

Superstition—that is the gist of the theme, and to our knowledge it has not been treated to any great extent as a subject for picture films before. Therefore, being novel and well enacted, it should receive great favor from exhibitors and their patrons.

Superstition is a difficult subject to visualize, but in this particular production it is vividly and comprehensively portrayed by showing in the early part of the story the dagger, suggestive of evil, with a quaint inscription upon its blade, forewarning its owner.

"The Japanese Dagger" possesses a novel feature in that a French battleship is shown in all her elegance, where on her decks and in her cabins many of the active scenes are laid.

Lieutenant Davis, a young naval officer, while in Tokyo, Japan, buys an old dagger as a curio. While looking at his curio with a Japanese friend, they are astonished to find a quaint inscription upon its blade, reading as follows: "Never must I leave this country; evil will befall any one who carries me away." Undisturbed upon any foreboding, Davis brings it home and hangs it on the wall of his studio.

The Lieutenant, under peculiar circumstances, makes the acquaintance of Count Firoenzi and his beautiful sister, Bertha. They become intimate friends, and while calling at his studio the Countess finds the photograph of a beautiful young woman. Upon finding the photograph, it is apparent that she is more attached to Davis than she had at any time before manifested. Struck with jealousy she takes it with her, together with an envelope which she suspects contains a love letter.

That evening, while alone in his room, the Lieutenant experiences a strange omen of ill-luck. Without apparent cause the dagger, which had been hanging on the wall over the Countess' portrait, falls and the glass on the portrait is broken. Davis, up to this time unconcerned about the dagger, now becomes alarmed.

The trio visit the battleship, and in the commander's room Davis finds that he has overlooked or mislaid an envelope containing a secret signal code. He immediately rushes home, but the code is nowhere to be found.

The Countess, at home, takes the opportunity to look again at the photograph which she had taken from the Lieutenant's room, and finds that it is no other than that of the Lieutenant's mother when she was a young lady. When she opens the envelope the secret code is revealed. Knowing that the Lieutenant had been reprimanded for the loss of this code and hoping to atone for her folly without recognition, she attempts to replace the documents. She succeeds in entering the studio under cover of darkness, but Davis has been on the lookout for a person he suspects of robbing him. As Bertha is bending over the table Davis bounds upon her black form, at the same time drawing the dagger from the wall. He strikes, and is horrified to see that he has stabbed his beloved, his innocent fiancee.

THE RAJAH'S CASKET
Gaumont

The Rajah's Casket is a beautifully photographed film. The scenery and episodes stand out in beautiful detail, and Biarritz comes out remarkably clear and distinct in the story of the plot, of which the following is taken from the manufacturer's description:

As a token of his esteem for Captain George Cooper's prospective father-in-law, Lord Peters, the Rajah of Palakotta presents the Captain with a casket of precious jewels. Cooper writes to his fiancee telling her of this gift he will give her on his return. The notorious cracksman, Clement Rocca, robs the mail-train and reads the letter. He determines to steal the casket. He goes to the English hotel where the Colonel and his daughter are staying. He meets them.

At the same hotel is Detective Harry Derwent. His suspicions are stirred by the action of Rocca. A telegram from Captain Cooper tells the time that his father and himself will arrive. The Colonel and his daughter accept Rocca's invitation to join him in a shooting trip on an island off the coast. On arriving at the island, the criminal, on a pretext, leaves his guests. He returns to the mainland, knowing when the tide rises the island will be completely submerged. Not all his own way, however, is the criminal going to conduct his nefarious schemes, for Derwent is keen and on the alert. On the previous night he had seen through a hole bored in the floor separating their rooms that Rocca is supplied with disguises. He had also learned of secret meetings with a man in an out-of-the-way cave, which is accessible only by a dangerous footpath.

Captain Cooper and his father duly arrive and the casket is deposited in the hotel safe. Captain Cooper goes for a walk on the cliffs. Half an hour later he is found insensible. The receipt for the casket has been stolen from the Captain's pocketbook. It is Rocca's work.

An accomplice, disguised as an orderly, goes to the hotel and is handed the casket on the strength of having the receipt. Cooper and the detective, arriving at the hotel, find that the box is gone. The Captain gives chase to an automobile disappearing down the road. The detective hastens to keep watch over the cave. He hides behind a projecting piece of rock. In the interior Rocca's accomplice hands over the casket. Derwent cautiously proceeds to the mouth of the cave, revolver in hand. He encounters Rocca. Before the latter recovers from the surprise, Derwent snatches the precious package from him. There is a struggle. The thief loses his hold on the slippery rocks and staggers back over the edge into the sea, disappearing forever.

The Colonel and his daughter, marooned on Bird's Island, have to swim for it when the tide rises. They keep afloat until they are picked up by a fishing smack. They don dry clothes loaned them by sailors and are soon back at the hotel. Captain Cooper returns from the unsuccessful pursuit of the casket. A happy reunion takes place when Detective Derwent enters with the jewels.

I also saw "The Convict's Secret," in which somewhat the same scenery was used as in the former picture. Both of them are well worthy the attention of exhibitors.

SELIG'S SACRED BULL IS SLAIN—FANATICAL HINDUS KILL "SANSKRIT"

"Sanskrit," the famous sacred bull which was recently purchased at a fabulous price by W. N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Company, and added to the large and strange family which makes its home on the Selig Wild Animal Farm, on the outskirts of Los Angeles, was slain in its cage at the farm some time during the night of April 27th.

The farm, an enclosed tract of some three hundred and twenty acres, in which about two hundred former denizens of the jungle are now engaged in the production of Selig wild animal thrillers, is believed to have been invaded before daybreak by a party of fanatical Hindus, who looked upon the recent use of the bull in a moving picture of jungle life as something sacrilegious.

The Hindus evidently made their entrance into the park by a secret and little used side door. They made their way to the cage of "Sanskrit," and by driving sharpened sticks into the animal's flesh and stabbing him with keen knives they managed to mutilate him in a terrible manner. The vandals then opened a number of the lion cages, intending to set loose the man-eaters, but the pitiful cries of the rapidly dying bull had by this time aroused the keepers, and attendants arrived in time to stop a stampede of the animals. "Sanskrit" was shot in order to alleviate his suffering.

"Big" Otto Breitkreutz, the Selig animal expert and keeper of the farm, has offered a large reward for the arrest of the slayers of the bull. The dead animal played one of the most important parts in Selig's productions.

HARRY RAVER SAYS ITALA FILMS ARE GOOD FROM START TO FINISH

There are two reasons why people are wont to come late to the theatre. It is considered "stylish." The other reason is that people know that in many plays the first act usually takes some time to get under way, and that they may safely come in late and still not miss the story's drift.

Harry R. Raver, director general of the Itala Film Company, herewith warns all spectators of the Itala films that they will surely miss something if they adopt such procedure in the instance of such films as "Tigris." "It starts when it starts," said Mr. Raver. "It doesn't waste time shaking hands and saying 'How do you do?' There is no long preface or wearisome details.

"The Itala Company recognizes that it is almost as important to leave out that which is not necessary as to put in that which is necessary. Every foot of film not requisite to expedite the story is harmful. It clogs and cloys.

"In these latter days, when entertainment assails us from all sides, the human eye and intelligence demand film stories be terse and tell only the vital. People do not want to be bored. The boresome is that which is unenlightening and unnecessary.

"I believe the Italians are masters of photographical verbs. It is the action that counts. 'Step lively' is a precept they have well acted upon.

"Their dramas are not diluted. There is no teaspoonful of real interest mixed in a tumblerful of dead, dry incidents. They have belief in human intelligence. They believe that people want something left to the imagination. Accordingly, all dragging detail has been mercifully left out. The motion picture public of America has ceased to be elementary. They are not being taught to walk or to look. They can think many times faster than the picture can move. Why, then, encumber the film with dead dross that brings a rush of yawns to the face?"

KINEMACOLOR FOR LADIES ONLY

The Kinemacolor Company of America has arranged with Gimbel Brothers to photograph in natural colors "La Parisienne Elegante in Her Boudoir," the demonstration for ladies only of the correct manner of wearing the latest styles of French lingerie. For this fashion display Paris has sent her loveliest and most novel specimens of under-apparel. From boudoir caps to stays, from fichued "combinations" to hand embroidered "throws," everything appertaining to the fashionably dressed French woman is displayed and applied. Women are shown the correct method of donning a corset, while the putting on of vest, chemise and billows of fairy-like gauzes, laces and filmy stuffs—some of them duplex, some of them single, all of them a mass of mysterious ruffles and fluffles and foam—are shown by nearly a score of beautiful models.

Naturally such intimate displays are not for the general public, but these pictures will be supplied to theatres having the Kinemacolor fashion service, with the understanding that they are to be shown only at special morning matinee performances for ladies only. The popularity of the "Fashion Parade" in Kinemacolor proved to exhibitors that style shows are something new in filmdom, and such a decided innovation has already resulted in renewed demand for the Kinemacolor Fashion Service.

Los Angeles, Cal.—Robert W. Woodley, manager of the Optic Theatre, is having plans drawn for a moving picture theatre to be erected on Broadway, between Eighth and Ninth streets.

ANOTHER SOLAX STATE RIGHTS FEATURE

"Kelly from the Emerald Isle," with the Well-Known Barney Gilmore

With the tendency steadily growing toward the big subjects for an entire evening's entertainment, the market is receiving an avalanche of features. The really big features are few. It requires more than merely three thousand or four thousand feet of film to make a feature. The Solax Company, because it has solved the secret of feature making and because it has evolved a perfect feature organization with Madame Blaché and Mr. Herbert Blaché as its guiding heads, has been able to command attention and sell its features on an open feature market. It is reported that the sales on the "Beasts of the Jungle" and "Dick Whittington," the last two Solax big three reel productions, have been a phenomenal success. For these features, they have sold nearly every state in the Union and some of the states they could have sold three times over.

SCENE FROM "KELLY FROM THE EMERALD ISLE"

The Solax Company has announced its third feature in its present series, entitled "Kelly from the Emerald Isle," with the popular Barney Gilmore in the leading role. Those who have seen this production are still talking about the wonderful railroad scene in which Gilmore makes a flying leap from the tracks of a train going at the rate of forty miles an hour. Many of the other scenes pulsate with thrill and action, while throughout is spread a quality of humor that is thoroughly Irish. Barney Gilmore's magnetic personality in conjunction with the popular character of the story should make "Kelly from the Emerald Isle" a big drawing card. Mr. Gilmore is so well known in nearly every town in the United States that the mere mention of his name excites interest. He has had an interesting career and has been in the public eye for the last two decades.

The members of the supporting company in the cast were chosen with discrimination. The cast includes such well-known players as Joseph Levering, Fred Magee, Fraunie Fraunholz, George Paxton, Blanche Cornwall, besides more than thirty supers. The production was prepared very carefully and large sums of money were spent for costumes, sets and properties. An Irish home was actually transplanted in America—for the bulk of the properties were secured from Ireland. It is a noteworthy production and is a credit to the Solax forces.

EDISON KINETOPHONE

"We know the early mayors of New York only by name, but beginning with Mayor Gaynor in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and thirteen we can, thanks to that great genius Thomas A. Edison, listen to the voices and watch the bodily movements and gestures of all the mayors down to our day. The first record will be that of Mayor Gaynor and the heads of the great city departments of that day in short talks on city government. I need not say to you how we all regret that the kinetophone was not perfected in time to record the voice and features of President McKinley and the great chief magistrates before him. However, we should be glad that the talking motion pictures enable you to quit the prosy printed history when you arrive at 1913 and to study history thereafter in the living records of the kinetophone."

The Modern Historic Records Association is composed of the leading men of the nation. Ex-President Taft is at its head. The late J. P. Morgan supported it liberally. When the kinetophone records were formally presented to William George Jordan, the managing director of the Association, in the office of Mayor Gaynor at the City Hall, this parchment document was drawn up to be preserved with them:

"In the spirit of its work of preserving for posterity the records of our contemporary history by the best methods known to modern science, the Modern Historic Records Association, with the courteous co-operation of Mr. Thomas A. Edison, invited the Hon. William J. Gaynor, Mayor of the City of New York, with some of his heads of departments, to make a talking picture record of their views on vital phases of the administration of New York, the greatest city of our nation.

"The record made by Mr. Edison's latest invention, the Kinetophone, was taken on April 17th, 1913, is hereby certified by all those represented in the original record, and on this first day of May, 1913, was committed to the care of the Modern Historic Records Association, with this attesting parchment, in its archives as a part of our civic history for future generations."

This parchment was signed by Mr. Edison, Mayor Gaynor and all those taking part in the record. Mr. Jordan and Alexander Konta signed for the Association.

There is no doubt that great interest has been aroused throughout the country in the Edison Talking Pictures and the public is keen for an opportunity to see just what they are. On this account road companies will be sent out at once by the American Talking Picture Company.

The plan is one of the most comprehensive possible to conceive for it embraces placing a traveling company in every state to play one night or more, in cities where the Kinetophone is not now being exhibited.

An extensive advertising plan has been worked, and attractive paper will be used in each city where the pictures are to be shown. This will consist of one-, three-, eight-, and twenty-four-sheet lithograph stands, together with booklets, couriers, etc.

Operating crews, together with a manager and advance man, will place each company on an independent basis and make it possible to cover the entire country between now and Fall, using wherever possible the largest theatres, armories and convention halls.

SUCCESSFUL OPENING OF THE MOTION PICTURE CENTER

Many Exhibitors, Manufacturers and Notables Were Present

The Motion Picture Center struck the keynote of success at its opening on Thursday evening, May 1st. A general chorus of approbation was given by the hundreds present to the organizers of this unique and much-needed enterprise.

The big new store, occupying the entire sixth floor of the Heidelberg Building, corner Broadway and Forty-second street, was brilliantly lighted and handsomely decorated. A band of musicians discoursed lively music. Pictures were shown and new inventions demonstrated to an interested audience. Twenty-nine manufacturers of supplies exhibited their products in the convenient and artistic booths into which the floor space is partitioned.

Already the slogan, "Meet me at the Center," has become popular in the motion picture field. Prominent exhibitors were present in a large body from New York and vicinity, and several were registered from Boston, Atlantic City, Wheeling, W. Va., Zanesville, O., and other parts of the country. They looked upon theatre decorations, flooring, uniforms, wall-papers, ticket machines, electrical supplies, stereopticons, cameras, projection machines, signs, frames, slides, musical effects, carbons, disinfectants, screens, and all the hundred and one kinds of equipment that constitute the modern successful theatre. Many novelties had not been seen before. Demonstrations were made from the various booths.

The Motion Picture Center is a big department store of motion picture supplies where the exhibitor can buy on the open market everything that goes into the modern theatre. But it is more than that. With the realization that many of those who build theatres are novices and that many others who are conducting theatres are handicapped by lack of practical knowledge and experience, the Center offers itself first and foremost as a headquarters of advice and information. This is given gratis and impartially. The floor manager is a mechanical expert of many years' experience. A practical theatre manager is in attendance. There are specialists, in fact, in every line to whom the operator and exhibitor can come with their troubles. An emergency department of repair work will be open day and night. There are also departments of advertising, construction, decoration, etc. The Center aims to build the better theatre of the future.

The Motion Picture Center was founded and will be conducted primarily in the exhibitor's interest. But it aims also to be the center of all phases of the motion picture art and industry. Free lectures and demonstrations of new and deserving inventions will be given. A projection room will be given over to the exhibition of new pictures.

Among those present at the opening were noticed: Pilar-Morin, the famous pantomimist, formerly one of the Edison stars; Jack Hemment, the photographer of the Rainey African pictures; James H. Hare, the Collier's war correspondent, who demonstrated a new gyroscopic camera; James K. Hackett, whose "Prisoner of Zenda" is now on the film; E. S. Porter, of the Famous Players Film Company; P. P. Sheehan, editor of Paris Herald; W. F. Haddock; Fred Beck; Jule Bernstein; Frank Manning, of the Mirror Screen; B. F. Porter; Eric Morrison and others. A large delegation from the New York Photographic Association came over after their dinner at the Hotel Astor.

BELASCO AND THE FAMOUS PLAYERS

When a few weeks ago David Belasco began to perfect his arrangements for the next season's tour of "A Good Little Devil," which has just closed its extraordinary run of 152 performances at the Republic Theatre, he was confronted by a demand for this charming fairy play several times greater than the possible supply. In other words, every manager in the country was demanding "A Good Little Devil" during its first season out of New York. On the other hand, a series of long engagements in Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and a few other large cities left no possible open time wherewith to satisfy the public in the cities that had been booked for next year.

One day, after meeting his friend Daniel Frohman, the solution of the problem dawned upon him. There was only one means whereby the play could be given in more than one city at the same time and with the "entire production and original cast." This was through the medium of motion pictures—and Daniel Frohman, managing director of the Famous Players Film Company, was the man to undertake it. Accordingly, Mr. Belasco and Mr. Frohman met again. The result was an arrangement with Mr. Frohman and Adolph Zukor, the president of the Famous Players Film Company, to produce all the wonderful scenes and effects of "A Good Little Devil" in motion pictures as soon as the play's regular run should have closed.

MISS MARY PICKFORD
Who will appear in "A Good Little Devil" in moving pictures after the regular run of this popular play.

This work is now going forward. The entire company, including William Norris, Mary Pickford, Ernest Truex, Ernest Lawford, Edward Connelly, and the others, are busily engaged every day at the studio of the Famous Players Film Company, and the results so far have exceeded the fondest hopes of all concerned. "A Good Little Devil" is peculiarly adapted to motion pictures, offering unequalled opportunities for illusions, visions and other camera effects. As the result, no city of any size in the country will be deprived next season of this Belasco fairy play. While the actual players in the actual production are appearing in large cities, the same players in motion pictures will be delighting untold thousands in the smaller cities which either could not be booked next season or whose stages were inadequate to hold the superb production, which has been accounted David Belasco's master-work.

MOVING PICTURES BY TELEGRAPH

C. Francis Jenkins Invents Machine for Them

It will be recalled, perhaps, that the Franklin Institute of Pennsylvania, which is one of the foremost scientific institutions in America, not so very long ago honored Prof. C. Francis Jenkins, who has just invented the telephotoscope, by presenting him with the Ellison gold medal for perfecting his phantoscope, and for being the first to project motion pictures on the screen in life-size or larger. Professor Jenkins was also honored by receiving the French decoration of the cross for his research work and his scientific inventions. From his original invention grew the motion picture machine and the talking picture machine.

Professor Jenkins has now elaborated on them both by producing the telephotoscope. By this wonderful invention, he claims, it is possible to reproduce things enacted in one city upon a screen in the theatres of other cities through telegraphic connection.

In operating the telephotoscope a camera is placed near the scene being enacted. The camera is connected by wire with a large copper plate that is chemically treated and connected with a very high power battery or dynamo. The plate and wires are connected with the moving picture camera especially constructed with a shutter, and the handle of the camera is turned around in the same way as by takers of regular motion pictures. The image is received on specially prepared glass and transferred through the back to the copper plate, this being in contact and perfectly in accord with the screen fitted at the other end of the wire.

Whether at a distance of 1, 10 or 100 miles the scene is reproduced on this plate and transferred to the specially prepared glass connected with the battery and baths for developing and projecting on the screen by a specially constructed machine for that purpose.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Everybody's Writing Them

TO paraphrase the familiar ditty, "Everybody's writing them." With the spread of the notion—thanks to the "school" advertisements—that picture play writing is largely a matter of pen, paper and ink, everybody, from the maid that serves one's breakfast in the morning to the motorman who brings one home at night, is writing picture plays. "Even a child can write them," you know. But it remained for a schoolma'am to give the art of playwriting its lowest rating among all human endeavors. "I am sending you what I believe a really novel playlet," the teacher wrote us, recently. "It is the result of my last convalescence from a hard attack of the grippe. Although I almost never go to picture shows, this seems to me the kind of thing the public ought to see." It's all a matter of taste, and maybe some concern would like a cold copy of this gripping plot.

Sorrows of Authorship

We firmly believe that picture playwrights are not receiving large enough remuneration for their scripts. A good working plot is worth more than $15 or $25. Some few concerns, to their credit, pay more. However, script writers may glean some consolation from the fact that "Paradise Lost" brought Milton about $25 in our money. Hawthorne for twenty years continued to be, to use his own words, "the obscurest man of letters in America." "There is not much market for my wares," he said another time. Thoreau is another example. A thousand copies of his "A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers" were printed, but very few of these were sold, and a considerable number were given away by the author. The remainder were stored in his attic. He grimly observed: "I have now a library of 900 volumes, the greater portion of which I myself have written." So you see many a writer has trod the thorny path of literary endeavor. Most picture playwrights are faring better than these great writers.

A Well-Put Argument

Ralph P. Stoddard, in the Cleveland Leader-News, answers a widely circulated story with the following excellent argument:

"Again has the old, wornout excuse of the 'influence of the picture show' been used to explain the disappearance of a Cleveland boy from his home. A member of the household stated to the newspapers that the young man had been much interested in moving pictures, and has written and sold several scenarios. Those familiar with scenario writing say that any boy who can write acceptable scenarios is able to take care of himself and no worry need be wasted upon him. He has learned something from attending picture theatres that he could not have gotten in school, for it is no easy task to create original stories and put them in proper scenario form. One Cleveland girl started writing moving picture scenarios, and now she is writing plays for Belasco. If the pictures have developed a talent for play writing out of the young man now away from home, his parents may have something to be thankful for in the future. The alarmist hardly can charge a 'crime' against the moving pictures in this case, but the incident again brings up the question: what did parents put the blame for their children's eccentricities upon before there were moving pictures?"

Thanks

Henry W. Mattoni, of New York, a successful script writer, addresses the following to Editor Saunders, of The News: "I wish to thank you for the prompt answer I received from William Lord Wright. He has also flashed some very important information on page 14 of The Moving Picture News, headed 'Why Wade Around,' and in 'Pertinent Pointers' this fact: 'Picture plays are not written, but constructed.' I hope that every one who writes picture plays did not miss the April 12th Moving Picture News, as it is worth ten times what it cost."

Has the Qualifications

A Quebec lassie writes this: "I have a good imagination. The little oddities in the street or most anywhere give me ideas that I develop and sell. Your advice on cultivating the habit of observation, given some time ago, has proven invaluable to me. I find, as you claimed, that observation is really a sixth sense, and that it can be strongly developed and made to prove valuable."

The Photoplay Magazine

Melmoth Y. Stokes, editor-in-chief of the Texas Sou'wester, writes:

> "On January 16th I sent the Photoplay Magazine $1.50 for a year's subscription and the privilege of having a script criticised by Mr. A. W. Thomas. I got a copy, but have not received one since, and they have not replied to my letters; they seem to have dropped me entirely. I should have concluded that the magazine company had dissolved but for the fact that some one must have received my letter, or it would have been returned."

The Photoplay Magazine has suspended publication. Mr. Neil G. Caward, formerly editor of the Magazine, is now editor of another journal. Mr. Thomas, formerly in charge of the Photoplay Magazine script department, is now editor of the Photoplay Clearing House, Court street, Brooklyn, N. Y. To Mr. Stokes and others who complain that scripts have not been returned, we advise querying Mr. Thomas, enclosing return envelope. He undoubtedly will explain matters satisfactorily.

No, They Will Not

A soft answer turneth away wrath, and we herewith inform Miss Martha June that script editors positively will not read scripts written in longhand. Buy or rent a typewriter. When you send your wares to market, always comply with market regulations.

Farewell, Goodall

Richard Goodall has resigned as editor of the Universal Clearing House. He was the first real-for-sure editor that concern has had since the halcyon days of Warren and Hoadley. He was both courteous and efficient, and that is going some!

The Name Changed

Modeste Hannis Jordan, editor of The Magazine Maker, informs us that the name of that bright publication for literary workers has been changed to The Writers' Magazine. The name the publication had been bearing narrowed the editorial scope.

Pertinent Pointers

Do not write picture plays as good as those you see on the screen. Write better ones.

When a script is returned marked "Identical to Magazine Story," do not let it happen again!

Some writers turn out too many picture plays. Do not try how rapidly you can write them, but how good you can write them.

Technique is not essential to your success, but your idea is a mighty important matter.

No individual has a monopoly on originality. Originality is apt to conflict occasionally.

Visualize what you write. Never mind the literary style. Work to compel the editor to see your story. Editors think in action.

If you cannot see the pictures in your mind's eye you cannot write an acceptable picture play. See the plot unfold as you write it.

Just because you are well read is no reason you should inflict the script editor with book adaptations. Whether copyrighted or not, editorial departments prefer to adapt their own literature. Think up an original idea. The editor may be closer to a library than you.

Create as often as possible a new location for your scenes. Avoid monotony, for audiences like versatility and change.

If a script is returned to you showing signs of wear and tear, be sure and recopy it. If the script has been refused by one editor, what is the use of telling another all about it? He can frequently ascertain the fact by the appearance of the script.

Better put your name and address on each sheet of manuscript. It is safer. Do not enclose loose stamps with a submitted script.

Into the Background

Sensational and spectacular pictures have been relegated to the rear by the Selig Company. The editors are going in for the quiet, convincing story of everyday life.

Newspaper Ideas

Much can be said for and against the policy of gleaning ideas from newspaper stories. It is almost as much of an art to read a newspaper properly as it is to properly evolve a picture play. Front-page stories in all newspapers should be tabooed by the writer in search for ideas. It is the obscure item that will often conjure up an inspiration for the idea seeker. We have found editorial columns, in certain newspapers, good hunting grounds, and once we obtained the idea for a two-reel script from a department store advertisement. A big newspaper will furnish a very wide field in which to roam, provided the wanderer among its pages uses discretion and good judgment. We can name several well-known writers of fiction who depend on newspapers for plot germs. They get the newspapers and search for their own material. Material furnished by press clipping bureaus should be avoided.

Argument for Film Credit

Here is another argument for film credit, written by a Philadelphia picture playwright:

> "I attended my favorite theatre the other evening and was surprised to see a slide which stated that one particular play 'was written by Mr. Jenkins, one of our popular ushers.' The play was from my pen, and I had spent the amount of the check received therefor."

Yes, that stunt has been worked hard, particularly in smaller cities. The author who makes possible the picture play should have full credit on the film, in the advertisements, and on the posters. He has earned such credit.

A New George Eliot

We have a new George Eliot amongst us, brothers and sisters. I refer to Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice, whose two-part story, "The Other Man," recently completed in Cosmopolitan, has taken the literary world by storm. The story will probably be dramatized. Miss Justice is also a successful writer of picture plays. Her literary style reminds many critics of George Eliot. There is a clearness, a straightforwardness, and at the same time a subtle appeal in her work that convinces and entertains. Miss Justice seems equally as successful and versatile in fiction or picture play writing.

That Insatiable Desire

One of the most successful of script writers drops us this line: "I am literally sold out of scripts to-day. Really this script business is like a grist mill. It simply gobbles up everything in sight and then you have to start out and do it all over again. If one would be a good script writer one must specialize to be a thing about as near 'perpetual motion' as possible. Still, there is always an insatiable desire to welcome the prospect of other acceptances, so I suppose, after all, this is the great stimulus for further work." And the check is not all the reward to the simon-pure enthusiast. There is the joy in work well done; the hope that something of worth has been added to reality; the feeling that one has contributed his or her mite to the enjoyment of others; the satisfaction of the completion of an artistic task. These and other thoughts come to the minds of sincere writers who are not entirely mercenary. And those authors who sometimes forget pecuniary rewards in the hope of higher things invariably find both.

Powers' Prize Contest

If our mind fails us not, we recollect the Powers Prize Contest, in which real money was paid for prize-winning scripts, and the contract provided that the winning scripts would soon be produced, with full credit to the authors. We are waiting, Hortense, waiting.

Be Systematic

Do you write all your script at one sitting, or, like some writers we know of, do you just tinker around, write a page, and then resume the task some other time? Always complete a task, once started. Also, do not start something you cannot finish. If you sit down to your typewriter with your story complete in your mind you will not arise before the first complete copy is completed. If you work the other way you probably have nothing to write about.

A Very Good Policy

Mr. George Hennessy, picture playwright, submits about two dozen more of his 1913 releases, which he overlooked in a previous letter, and writes: "I fully sympathize with your war on the 'fake schools.' I shall endeavor to give any information that I have gained through experience to my pupils, and try my utmost to make them successful playwriters, and if I find that they are utterly incapable, I shall honestly tell them so." This sounds like the real thing. Individual instruction is what scores, and the game needs more high-class players of the Hennessy stripe. We hope to hear from him early and often.

As to Copyright

It would be nice if the author could copyright his script before it is produced, but he cannot. A picture play manuscript, as such, will not be extended copyright privilege, it being held that in manuscript state it has no more standing in copyright law than an unpublished book, and that, unlike the dramatic play, it must be produced to be entitled to protection. Mr. Sargent, of New York, threshed out the question with the Register of Copyrights some months ago. However, the author has recourse to common law if he can prove that his play has been "cribbed." However, such proof is very frequently difficult to obtain.

Another Method Given

Another well-known author, too modest to permit his name to be printed, although you would know him by reputation in a minute, tells his system of work. He writes: "Maybe my methods will be of benefit and interest to others. Whenever an idea comes to me I jot it down on a bit of paper, which I file. I always know where to put my hand on a particular inspiration. I never strive for ideas, for it would be useless. They come to me and I write them down. Sometimes I am conversing with friends; sometimes I wake up from sleep; often I am dining with friends—an idea pops out of nowhere and I write it down. I am patient, and that is why I have come as far as I have. I am not easily discouraged. I wrote the first script of a multiple reel story 25 times before it suited me." Think, ye writers, of revising a script 25 times! This is no "just dashing off a story" and rushing it in; it is care and patience personified. The script did not exactly suit the author, so he revised it 25 times before it finally left his desk. Genius is the capacity for taking pains, and this particular writer has genius!

No Swallowtails

We are informed by Paul J. Byrnes that no swallowtails or tuxedos are essential to the Middle West Script Writers' dinner at Hotel Euclid, Cleveland, Saturday evening, June 28. The feast and gathering is for the purpose of getting acquainted and to exchange experiences. "The effete Eastern style will be in disfavor at this dinner, and real-for-sure Middle West cordiality will prevail," to quote Mr. Byrnes. Two dollars a plate is the price, and reservations are to be complete by June 10.

THE MAN IN THE SICK-ROOM

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Solax Release)

WE are all well aware of the fact that young women (not at all to mention the men) sometimes—and we might even say often—marry for money and social position.

That this is a most deplorable state of things is not to be denied. We might say much on the subject in general, but just now, one case and what happened is the thing that interests us.

When Miriam Scott heard Robert Henderson's proposal she hesitated. "I would rather have a little time to think it over," she said, and the man answered: "I have much to give you, Miriam. All my wealth and my social position are yours. You care for me, do you not?"

"Oh, yes," she had assured him. "I am very fond of you, but—well, I wish I loved you more."

"You will learn to love me," Henderson insisted. "Why, there will be nothing to keep you from loving me. You won't have anything else to do."

In her heart Miriam knew that this argument was of no value; but she had always been poor, and the glamour of the life of ease held out to her closed the door to the truth. So she said to Henderson:

"Give me a week. I will tell you at the end of that time what my decision is."

"Very well. At the end of a week I shall come for my answer."

But during the week came another man, Richard Blakely. He was a young doctor, practising in the city in which Miriam lived. All through his professional course he had been inspired and carried over the rough places by the hope of having Miriam for his wife. This hope had been more than hope. Dr. Blakely felt that he had the unspoken consent of the girl he loved.

When the young physician was preparing himself for his profession, Miriam was waiting eagerly for the completion of his course. She, too, felt that there was an understanding between them, although no word had been spoken.

And now he had come to make the understanding sure.

"Miriam, we have known each other a long time," he began. "Before I went away I did not speak plainly, because I was not in a position to marry, and I felt I had no right to bind you when I did not know how long it would be until I was in a position to do so. I have waited until my practise was established before speaking to you on the subject. Now the time has come," he finished, tenderly.

SCENE FROM "THE MAN IN THE SICK ROOM"

Miriam did not speak. She sat, pale and almost trembling, beside him.

"Aren't you glad the time of waiting is over, dear?" he asked, taking her hand.

She withdrew it quickly.

"I—I am afraid I must disappoint you," she whispered.

"You—I don't understand."

"I cannot marry you, for I am going to marry another man."

"Then I was mistaken," he said, bitterly. "I thought you cared for me, and I thought you were the kind of woman who would never change. I am sorry I was so presumptuous. Forgive me—and good-by."

He arose to go, but Miriam stopped him with a gesture. The expression of her eyes made him sit down again.

"I could let you think that," she began, "but I am not going to. I am going to tell you the truth. It may hurt you less, for it will make you despise me."

SCENE FROM "THE MAN IN THE SICK ROOM"

She stopped a moment to gain courage. Then, very slowly and deliberately she said: "I love you, as you supposed; but I am not going to marry you. I am going to marry another man because he is rich. I have been poor all my life—just that terrible, respectable poor that is so torturing. A man of wealth and position has asked me to marry him. He gave me a week to think the matter over, and then he will come for his answer. I like him, but I do not love him; but I am going to marry him."

"Oh, Miriam, you cannot do this and ruin your life!" pleaded Blakely.

"This is no sudden decision," she continued. "I have thought it over and weighed it well. He is rich and you are just beginning life as a professional man with no money. Oh, I know what it is! My father was a professional man and I have been poor all my life. Forgive me; I must do it. Try not to be too hard on me in your thoughts. Good-by."

Blakely saw that she had hardened her heart against her own better nature, and that argument was of no avail.

"I hope you will find happiness some way," he said, and left her.

Miriam did not altogether deceive Robert Henderson. She did not tell him she loved another man, but she did not let him believe that she loved him absolutely.

"I will not deceive you," she said to him. "I am fond of you, as I told you before; but if you were a poor man I would not marry you. Do you still want me, knowing that?"

"Yes, for you will love me more, I am sure," he answered.

After her marriage Miriam saw very little of Dr. Blakely. She moved to another part of the city, entirely away from her old surroundings. Once or twice she saw him at a little distance, so that she was unable to speak.

Of this she was glad, for she felt that she could not bear to look into his eyes. Even at a distance she could see that he was pale and worn.

Miriam's life was very full of gaiety the first year after her marriage—so full, in fact, that she was left little time to think.

At the end of the second year the baby came. Then things began to change. The mother instinct was strong in Miriam and she insisted upon staying much more with her baby than was customary among society friends.

"You never go anywhere with me any more," complained her husband. "You almost make me wish we didn't have the baby."

"Don't say that, Robert," she begged. "I cannot bear to have you say one word against baby, even in a joke, and I don't believe you were joking that time."

"No, I wasn't joking. I thought I was winning your love, and now the baby seems to be taking it away from me."

"She isn't very well," pleaded the mother. "I must stay with her tonight."

"Of course you must be with her if she's sick. But I'm not talking about tonight; I'm talking about all the time. You're making the baby an excuse to keep away from me. I remember what you told me—that if I were a poor man——"

"Stop!" cried Miriam. "I was honest with you, and you shall not throw that at me now. I have been to you the best wife I could, and I am going to be the best mother I can. But I warn you, Robert, that your love for your baby, or your lack of love for it, means everything to us now."

The angry man left the room, slamming the door behind him.

How long she sat still by the sleeping child Miriam did not know, but the clock striking twelve aroused her. As she arose to go to prepare for the night she looked down at the child. Suddenly she stiffened her little arms and legs, and a queer, unnatural color crept over her face.

The mother fled from the room, her first thought being to reach the telephone. As she was about to pass into the next room she stopped as though frozen to the spot. Before her stood a man wearing a black mask.

In a moment the mother's anxiety overcame her fear, and she said earnestly, "Oh, I am in such trouble. My baby is very ill. Please let me telephone to the doctor."

The man looked at her suspiciously for a moment. "Let me see the baby," he demanded.

Quickly he ran back into the room where the little one lay.

The man bent over the bed, and then said in a voice of authority, "Bring a light here."

Miriam obeyed.

The man looked closely at the child and then at the face of the mother. Stooping over the child, he raised it in his arms and said in a voice not to be ignored, "You haven't time to get a doctor. Get me a tub and some very hot water as quick as possible. I've doctored them before.. You've no time to lose."

Quickly the mother obeyed the order, her instinct telling her that the man was right.

When the water was ready the masked man had the baby undressed and laid it in the bath. For a half hour he worked with it without speaking, excepting to give an order.

"Thank God," Miriam heard him say, under his breath, when the child was sleeping normally again.

"What can I ever do for you?" asked the mother. "You must take this, and I shall do anything else I can." She held out a bill toward him.

"No," he said, "I do not wish anything."

"Why will you not take money? You have done what a doctor might have done, and I should have paid him."

"What I have done I have done for love. I did not know whose house I came into, or I should not have come. But I am glad that I did come and could do you a service." He pulled his mask from his face and Miriam saw before her Richard Blakely.

"Oh, how can it be you?" she cried.

"I am what you see me. I was not strong enough to stand my disappointment and got into bad company. I have come to this, that is all."

There was a ring at the bell and Miriam heard a maid in conversation with a man at the front door. Something seemed to tell her she was needed quickly, so she went downstairs.

"We are looking for a burglar we have traced here," stated a policeman. "Have you heard any one this evening?"

"I have been up with my sick baby," she answered. "The doctor is with her now. I should probably have heard any if he entered."

"Yes, you probably would. We must have missed his track somehow. But I'd have sworn he came here. Good-night. Sorry to bother you."

When Miriam returned to Blakely she was carrying a suit of her husband's clothes.

"Put these on and go out by the front door," she told him. "If the police are still watching they will think you are the doctor I told them was here."

She slipped her hand for a moment into the pocket of the coat.

"Good-by and thank you a thousand times. Good-by."

When he had gone Miriam knelt beside the bed and lay her head beside the baby. So her husband found her when he returned. As she looked up at the touch of his hand she saw a new expression on his face.

"How is she?" he asked, softly.

Then Miriam told him the story of the evening and how their baby had been saved from death.

"I have been a brute, dear," Robert Henderson acknowledged. "I have been walking around fighting with myself all evening. I think I have won. I understand some things I did not understand before. Mainly, that if you love my child so much you cannot be lacking in love for me. Forgive me, dear, and let us draw closer together through our love for the little one, which belongs to us both."

"Oh, Robert, I do forgive you," she whispered, "and I feel my love for you growing stronger even now."

BREWERS ALARMED

The Atlantic City, N. J., Evening Union says:

The latest outcry against the popular moving picture show, which is rapidly multiplying in almost every city, comes from brewers who have joined the "upper classes" in "viewing with alarm" the tremendous popularity of the movies and their grip upon thousands who have to find cheap entertainment.

The nimble nickels that used to go for foaming lager are now buying diversion for the whole family, and a keen imagination is necessary to convince anybody that the world is the worse for the change.

Buffalo, N. Y.—James A. Lockhart will build a moving picture theatre at the south west corner of Briggs avenue and Tonawanda street.

JUST GOSSIP

By The Mahoney

To The Mahoney a meeting with Tom Bedding always recalls John Ridd, the hero of Blackmore's "Lorna Doone," for Tom (like Blackmore's hero) is a physical giant, and looks capable of performing great feats of strength, like John Ridd.

Then the opening chapter of "Lorna Doone":

"I, John Ridd," (if The Mahoney remembers correctly) is the way it begins, strongly suggests Tom.

In fact, the personal pronoun is so markedly in evidence when Tom begins to write about anyone else, that it never fails to carry conviction for Tom. Tom's strut, Tom's hesitant manner of speech, and weighing of words, and that extra good measure of the personal pronoun, exhales a fragrance of self-esteem seldom encountered in the world of "lettres."

Tom founded the Implet.

What has become of Tom and—the "Implet"?

Mahoney Will Cowper, long and favorably known in the leading theatres of this country and England in dramatic work, but more recently popular as a motion picture actor, with Thanhouser, Imp, Reliance, and other prominent firms, is considering a permanency with one of the large Western producing companies of the Trust.

Will is efficient, capable and painstaking, and has done excellent work in many notable films. He will be a valuable addition to any studio.

An interesting story is current, that a manufacturer more or less prominent in the industry has engaged a suite of offices in the vicinity of Madison avenue and Fifty-ninth street, so as to be in close touch with the Municipal Court.

Everyone with whom this poor unfortunate comes in contact in a business way seems to misunderstand him, and the outcome is invariably a lawsuit.

So much of his time has been spent in answering court summonses that it has been a serious detriment to his business.

It is said he has lost six suits in the past eight months.

The clerical-visaged, scholarly and dignified J. Halleck Ried, it is reported, was recently seen studying French over the shoulder of a very beautiful young lady in an uptown Broadway car.

Both appeared so deeply absorbed in their Ollendorff that they seemed oblivious to each other's presence.

Can it be possible that "Hal" has in mind a three-reel historical subject of the time of the "Little Corporal"?

William D. Emerson (known to his intimates as just plain "Billy"), late of the American and Atlas Manufacturing companies forces, left, early this week for Halifax, N. S., where he goes to assume control of the production department of the Canadian Bioscope, Ltd.

Will has had a wide and varied experience in the film industry and is one of the most efficient directors in this country.

He is particularly happy in handling large ensembles, as is evidenced by the vast number of three-reel subjects made for the Atlas and American while acting as manager of production for these universally recognized companies.

Harry McRae Webster, of the Essanay Company, has been much in evidence, "breezing" up and down Broadway for the past week.

His presence in New York has created quite a stir among the Mahoneys for they have learned he is very strong at court with the head of that important Chicago concern.

It is said that when Harry landed in there, in the fall of 1910, the wise ones gave him four weeks of life with the Essanay Company, but Harry outlived their prognostications by a large margin of time, for he is now in the beginning of his fourth year as producing director of the Eastern Company, with more to come. And if report is true, he is so strong in favor, through marital ties, that he's just like one of the family.

They do say that Harry conducts a Cinematography kindergarten in his richly comparisoned home, the object in view, to have Harry McRae, Jr., succeed his "pere" as manager of production with the Essanay.

Mahoney Frank Smiley identified as leading man with the Ryno Company since its inception, has recently been placed under contract by Messrs. Noble and Ryttenberg for an extended period. His dramatic training, together with an extensive traveled experience, makes him a valuable asset to any company.

Frank's life has been one of adventure from early boyhood. One thrilling episode is worthy of record.

While midshipman aboard one of our battleships of the Pacific squadron, in company with several shipmates, he went ashore at Lima, Peru.

Their objective point was the bullring on the Plaza di Archo. After a day of research among the places of interest in which this ancient city abounds, and a night of conviviality in its quaint cafes, tired and worn, they returned to their lodgings. At early dawn they were aroused from their fitful slumbers by the measured tread of feet, moving with precision, to the tones of a mournful chant.. Frank and his companions looked from the windows, where they saw several men, handcuffed and manacled, attended by priests and a squad of native soldiers.

The boys lost no time in dressing, and led by Frank, they reached the market place, where the squad halted. Inquiry developed the fact that the unfortunates were several New York boys who had gone to South America in search of adventure, and had been convicted by a military court martial for some trivial infraction of the laws and sentenced to death.

Learning the truth, Frank's sympathy and loyalty were aroused, so he waited for the crucial moment, and when the men were blindfolded and placed with their backs to the wall, everything in readiness for the command to fire, he sprang forward, struck the officer in charge fairly on the point of the jaw, putting him down and out. His shipmates answering the call, were soon in the melee, the execution was interrupted, and subsequent investigation proved the men's entire innocence and they were released.

The Mahoney heard a succession of warwhoops a day or so since in the vicinity of the Hotel Astor, and thinking it might be one of the Honorable W. F. Cody's Indians on a rampage, he hastened to investigate, and found it was that genial and clever director, Frank Beal, just returned from a protracted tour of investigation among the studios in the middle and far West.

ITALA FILM COMPANY OF AMERICA

Eugenics is the vital issue in the new Itala feature, "The Dread of Doom." The question is, "Shall diseased persons marry?"

In these latter days, when scientist and sociologist strive to make physically better men and women of unborn generations, eugenics is strengthening mortal clay for futurity by reducing probability of hereditary taint through mesalliance.

Tuberculosis is the bar sinister which in "The Dread of Doom" separates a real man from the woman he loves. Accidentally inoculated through the bite of a monkey, he does not discover that the tubercles are sapping his life until nigh to the night of his wedding. There is, however, but one course for a man with a conscience and a sense of honor—not to join himself with the woman and, because of his malady, wreck her life and jeopardize lives that might come.

It is gratifying that intellectual dignity is personified in "The Dread of Doom." It proves conclusively that we are living down the sobriquet of "lowbrows"; that in motion pictures of force and significance are being taught the truths of the times. Here is a propaganda of salutary influence.

Film history will be made by Harry R. Raver and Philip Klein, the son of Charles Klein, the playwright, if negotiations to put Itala multiple-reel masterpieces in Broadway theatres, not in conjunction with regular service, are consummated.

Inasmuch as Itala features at the present time do not exceed four reels, this action in "featuring features" whose measure do not nearly approach the eight and nine-reel length of "Quo Vadis" and others, the enterprise specifically is unprecedented.

VITAGRAPH JOTTINGS

The new private exhibition room at the Vitagraph Studios has now been completed. The room is fifteen feet longer than the one that has formerly been used and is much more pleasant to work in. The large amount of work now being done and the care which is bestowed upon each film require that the rooms be kept in constant use, and the recent improvements in them are consequently much appreciated.

* * * *

"The Deerslayer," a special two-part feature, to be released by the Vitagraph Company on Wednesday, May 7, should be welcomed by all exhibitors as a strong drawing card for special classes from the schools and colleges. "The Leather-stocking Tales" of J. Fenimore Cooper, from which the story of "Deerslayer" is taken, are not only popular as reading matter, but have a high educational value for all students of American history and literature, the author being contemporaneous with Washington Irving and other great American writers. The picture itself is a thrilling record of the early struggles of the pioneers of the country against the roving Indians, and appeals not only to the young, but to all who have a drop of red blood in their veins or a spark of patriotism in their makeup.

Mr. Tefft Johnson, of the Vitagraph players, has returned to the studios again after a few days' illness, in which pneumonia was threatened. Mr. Charles Eldridge also has been on the sick list, but is now happily at work again.

Quite a bunch of letters arrived on Monday from the Vitagraph "globe trotters," dated from Cairo, Egypt, where they expect to remain for some time. Maurice Costello writes very enthusiastically about the trip and tells of some interesting Egyptian picture plays which the party are now working on.

The three beautiful lions of Mlle. Devarou, with which she has recently been doing the Keith Circuit, have been secured by the Vitagraph Company for use in their animal pictures. There are now fifteen lions and lionesses in the menagerie at the studios, and the number will be further increased later, as soon as the new cages now being built are completed.

Mr. William Humphrey, director at the Vitagraph Studios, is better known to the world for his characterizations of the Emperor Napoleon than for anything else. He has played the part on the regular stage more times than any other actor, appearing with Mrs. Langtry and many other well-known stars. Since he has entered the realm of moving pictures he has continued to play Napoleon, and the Vitagraph picture plays in which he has taken this part have won universal acclaim.

In connection with his latest production, "Hearts of the First Empire," an amusing story is being told. Mr. Humphrey dines with his friends regularly at one of the New York restaurants and always occupies the same table, and of course is regularly attended by the same colored waiter. Yesterday he noticed a great change in the man's behavior toward him. Instead of his usual easy-going, light-hearted manner, there was a hesitancy in his speech and a look on his face that showed that he was ill at ease. His customary air of deference was supplanted by an almost abject obsequiousness that manifested itself in genuflections and long-drawn bows that attracted the attention of everybody in the restaurant and afforded considerable amusement to the other guests. At first Mr. Humphrey did not pay much attention to him, but he could not help but notice the change in the man's manner. At last, after the dessert was finished, he came to Mr. Humphrey and placed a finger-bowl before him, accompanying the action with a profound curvature of the body. Then he stood up straight, as a soldier at attention, gazing at the actor with a look of mingled admiration and awe, and said earnestly: "Yo' Empoahship, sah, I seed yo' at de theayter las' night in a picter call' 'Hahts o' the Fus' Empiah,' and fo' de Lawd, I'se been 'fraid of yo' evah since. Poah cullud folks don't stand no chance nohow, whin all dem fine ladies and gemmen is skeered inter doin' what yo' tell 'em. I tell yo', yo' Empoahship is a dog gone cantankous man when yo' get a-goin'! But Lordy, how can yo' find it in yo' haht to done go and crowd them poah womin so. Give 'em their own ways, Mistah Empoah. The worl' will resolve jes' the same an' yo'll get 'long jes' as well."

UNIVERSAL CALIFORNIA NOTES

Ramona Langley, a native daughter of California, who recently graced "A Modern Eve" in the role of Ranee, made her debut in moving pictures last week as a member of Phillips Smalley's Rex Company.

The directors of the Universal Company and their wives were the guests of General Manager Aubrey M. Kennedy a week ago last Sunday on an excursion to the top of Mt. Lowe, and to the Alpine Tavern. A special car of the Pacific Electric Company left Hollywood Boulevard and Gower street at nine o'clock for the long trip to Pasadena and the celebrated mountain and tavern. A stop was made at the mountain to enable the guests to get the wonderful view, and then the party proceeded to Alpine Tavern, where luncheon was served outdoors. After a delightful day the excursionists returned to Los Angeles in time for dinner.

Evelyn Quick, who was for a while a member of the Keystone Company with Fred Mace and Ford Sterling, is now the enthusiastic leading lady of Director A. E. Christie's company. The new Universal office building at Hollywood is rapidly nearing completion. It is opposite the Hollywood studios, and is more than double the capacity of the structure that was burned in the recent fire. The architecture is handsome and harmonizes with that of the surrounding buildings, and the plans call for a general office room, an accounting room, a pay office, scenario department, general manager's office, and several private offices. Another new building is being erected in the vicinity by H. S. Griffith, who was at one time connected with Director Matthews. It will be occupied by a restaurant, ice-cream parlor and barber shop, a trio of conveniences that will be much appreciated by visitors and residents.

An interesting sight is afforded by Comanche, the trick pony, "taking home" his mistress, Mona Darkfeather, of the Bison forces. When Comanche thinks he has shown off sufficiently, he takes Mona's sleeve in his teeth and, with his head over his shoulder, leads her off. The pony is a capable actor, and he is helping to make Director Montgomery's pictures additionally interesting.

EDISON PLAYERS SAIL FOR ENGLAND

Director Charles J. Brabin, Miriam Nesbitt, Marc MacDermott, and Otto Brautigan, photographer, sailed for England on Saturday, May 3d.

As the result of Manager Plimpton's visit to Europe last month, arrangements have been perfected for an excellently equipped studio, and a strong company has already been assembled to support these famous players.

The trip will be an extended one, probably covering six months at least, during which time the players will cover many points of interest throughout the British Isles.

Miss Nesbitt was delighted at the prospect of another restful sea voyage, for she has not had a moment's rest since her return from England last fall. Though she is taking a shipload of trunks with her, she says that one of her first excursions upon arriving at the other side will be a trip to Paris for the purpose of laying in a stock of spring hats and gowns. Though an American, Miss Nesbitt is well acquainted in London by reason of her performances there, as well as her long sojourn there last year, and she is looking forward to the renewal of many pleasant acquaintances.

Marc MacDermott is characteristically enthusiastic over the prospect of once more returning to his native land. Always a great popular favorite in England, he counts his British friends and admirers by the scores. But best of all, the actor's mother and sister are to follow shortly after him, and are to remain in England during his entire stay there.

Like Miss Nesbitt, Mr. MacDermott has worked incessantly since his arrival from the other side last fall, and looks forward to the trip with a great deal of pleasant anticipation.

The only thing which fills him with regret is the fact that he can no longer make his periodical visits to the East Side picture theatres, where he is in the habit of watching the effect of his acting upon the audience. Mr. MacDermott considers these people to be his best critics and nothing pleases him more than the air of tense stillness which pervades the theatre when he is playing a big scene. The actor has always vehemently maintained that these people of the East Side are sadly misjudged by the great majority of manufacturers, who believe that they care only for sensational melodrama. Mr. MacDermott has found them appreciative of the most poetical atmosphere and eager for the best that the picture play offers.

Edna Hamel, the gifted little Edison player, is confined to her home as the result of a fall which might easily have proven fatal. The little actress is a gifted dancer and devotes her spare time to the study of fancy steps. While at dancing school a few days ago, she attempted to lean back and touch her head to the floor—a feat which she has often accomplished. But this time her foot slipped on the polished floor and she fell with her head doubled under her. Beatrice Mable, who was with her, fainted at the sight, for, as she said later, it did not seem possible that the human head could be twisted into such a position without breaking the neck.

Edna was unconscious, but examination showed that the only injury was to the knee, where several ligaments toward the knee-cap had been wrenched out of place. The injury is an exceedingly painful one, but there is every indication that the patient will be at her post in the studio within a few weeks.

J. S. Dawley and his company of Western players are back at the Edison studio in the Bronx after an absence of eight months. They are all bubbling over with enthusiasm over their long stay in the land of perpetual sunshine, and their well-tanned, healthy faces speak volumes for the ideal conditions under which they have been living.

Laura Sawyer, more vivacious than ever, is exhibiting a collection of magnificent ostrich plumes and Mexican drawn work that is the envy of all the feminine players at the studio. Chief among her treasures, however, is a handsome sombrero, which was presented to her on the day of her departure by the members of the Long Beach Club.

HUNGRY REALISM IN "ROBESPIERRE"

A hungry mob scene that needed no rehearsal to make it realistic was enacted during the production of the Imp three-reel feature "Robespierre" under the direction of Herbert Brenon.

A morning of strenuous mob scenes was followed by a call for luncheon. The delicatessen that furnishes lunches for the Imp studio had supplied the three Imp companies all right, but the mob of 200 men, women and children had been overlooked. They were becoming peevish. Director Brenon, to save time, decided to go on with the mob scenes. The particular scene to follow was the mob's attack on the bake-shop, which was elaborately stocked with loaves of bread, rolls, cakes, pies and all kinds of pastry. When the mob got a peep at the foodstuffs—well, you can imagine what happened. The whistle blew; the scene was on; the hungry mob made one grand onslaught. All well armed with axes, clubs and stones, they smashed down the doors and crushed in the show windows, climbed through and helped themselves in true mob fashion to everything edible in sight. Then, picking up the provender, they scurried to all parts of the studio to lunch sumptuously.

THE MEINHARDT CLOCK SLIDE

Fred A. Apfelbaum, president of the Levi Company, Inc., 1560 Broadway, New York, slide makers, announces the purchase of the exclusive manufacturing rights of The Meinhardt Clock Slide from H. A. Meinhardt and Thomas J. Urell, owners of the basic patent. Some years ago, when the patent was issued, Messrs. Meinhardt and Urell started a company for the promotion and manufacture of the new slide, but through inexperience and the small demand at the time the project was not a success and the invention remained under cover. Out of touch entirely with the industry, the inventor was not aware of the fact that certain manufacturers were producing and selling his patented slide without his permission, and immediate action will be taken against those concerns for damages. Exhibitors are cautioned not to use any clock slides not made by the Levi Company, Inc., in as much as the showing of the same makes them a party to the infringement and therefore liable. The Levi Company, Inc., will make up the new slides in a wide variety of beautifully colored designs, announcement of which will be made at an early date.

THE Ohio Legislature has created a state board to censor moving pictures and the exhibitors of the Buckeye state will have to pay the salary of each of three censors, who will be appointed by the Governor, who is building up a nifty political machine. The right of municipal censorship in addition to that of the State Board is also upheld. We know for a fact that a great number of smaller exhibitors in Ohio keenly resent this added burden. The California Legislature has gone one better, to use a common expression, and has passed a law prohibiting the representation on moving picture films of girls with their skirts flying. But what would be far more desirable in legislation, is a law prohibiting theatres from producing drunken and other undesirable characters on the stage. An actor representing a drunkard is calculated to make a joke out of a miserable habit, or in any event to lessen its enormity. And it makes no difference how well the "crook" character is played, it should not be tolerated by intelligent society. Attracted by the transitory success of a few "crook" plays, one or two film manufacturers have been doing likewise. Stop it! The flying skirts is a flash of innocence by its side.

We have our moments of bright optimism when we are quite hopeful that the uplifting and refined barroom scenes in Western picture plays may be discounted in favor of the refined and uplifting Western scenic backgrounds.

Let us sing ho, of the dignity of literature! That is, the real stuff; not the literature that is merely scrambled together for the daily press, but the high-browed stuff released sometimes by the festive moving picture publicity agent. We have been noticing the daintiness and the charm of house-organ announcements and of certain posters, etc., for some time. One advertisement recently called attention to: "The Squedunk Film's Company's Latest: It's a Bird!" Notice this artistic and clever line. Here, in a moment, you have epigram and eloquence combined. Another announcement that captivated us was: "See Slowgoer buried alive; more sensational and horrifying than all his previous adventures." This, we consider an all-embracing and forceful description of what must be a very interesting feature film. The announcement will undoubtedly attract all the best people into any theatre that uses the announcement. The moving picture business and the circus business are not one and the same. Conservative expression and truthful presentation of wares will win sooner or later. The exhibitor and the exhibitor's patrons are taking fantastic statements, couched in high-flown language, with grains of salt. We notice that the best publicity men have left the beaten track and are profiting thereby. They are teaching the public to put dependence in their announcements.

A picture play author writes us that he is adding to his income by raising mushrooms in the basement of his house. This shall not tempt us, however, to make any casual remarks concerning the "best cellars."

Some directors of moving picture plays are great, and others have greatness thrust upon them. Here is one of the latter kind. He thinks Dickens, Thackeray, Poe and the rest of the classical writers passe. We were arguing with him the other day and he said in his bright, intelligent and highly original manner: "I pass up the classic scripts. I hate 'em. I think people who read classics in preference to modern stories and novels are just posing. I can't read any of the old writers at all. I don't like Shakespeare; who does? As for Dickens, I read 'David Copperfield' and 'The Cricket on the Hearth' and gave him up. I think his characters absurd and unnatural. To me they are caricatures rather than characters." The popular director who thus expressed his views is just great on putting over wild Western barroom scenes, and the adventures of "high-class criminals," and he can put out two Harold MacGrath pictures every week that will cause the Matinee Girl to melt into pearly tears.

The Vermont maple syrup that this palladium of liberty and champion of free speech occasionally obtains by the simple but shrewd ruse of putting in an editorial complimenting certain friends up there is so good that we hate to drop any of it on our fashionable waistcoat, as one always refers to one's vest in moving picture circles.

One of the most instructive and entertaining inventions is the Edison Kinetophone. The Kinetophone is immensely popular in the Middle West and we are glad. It is a marvelous blending of the moving picture and the phonograph, and Thomas A. Edison, in a recent interview, asserts that he will make it even more natural than the real thing, if that were possible. Looking at this wonderful performance, one is apt to reflect what would have happened to history's records had moving pictures and the Kinetophone been a reality a generation ago. For instance, if we could look on a Kinetophone and see and hear Patrick Henry in the House of Burgesses, or Henry Clay in the Senate of 1850, or Abraham Lincoln on the field of Gettysburg, what a joy and a charm and an educational acquirement would be added to the experiences of life. Before this century ends the people living then will enjoy just such attraction made possible by Cinematography.

The effect of the moving picture shows upon the minds of children is troubling some of our public-spirited people exceedingly. One investigator is confident that much injury can be done, and is done, by pictures which display acts of violence, rude horseplay, accidents, and contests in which the element of excitement is plainly observable. It is difficult not to feel that all this worrying is due to the fact that Cinematography is comparatively new, and not yet adjusted to the general order of things. Why should the pictures of a cowboy romance be more dangerous to the mind of youth that the make-believe pursuit of the horse thief around the rings of the Wild West circus? Does the horseplay of the film figures breed coarseness more than do the antics of the circus clowns or the sometimes suggestive jokes in the "refined" vaudeville entertainments? There are elements of excitement in a baseball game, or when the children play crack-the-whip in the school yard, if you judge by the racket, that would swamp the excitement discoverable in films of an automobile race or an Indian war-dance. It is an unfortunate fact that some film stories are not proper for minds of children. This situation is a burden that must be borne by wise and judicious manufacturers who are compelled to shoulder a part of the blame cast upon the industry because of the actions of a few money-greedy and ignorant men. However, it is unfair to class all moving picture romances with the limited number of unwise films. Only of recent years have people thought of studying the minds of children. That this is done is indicative of progress. Yet some of this studying appears as if it consisted first of laying down a theory and then arguing like mad to prove it—with the child lost to sight amid the dust of controversy.

Ralph D. Stoddard writes the following well-put statement in the Cleveland, O., Leader-News:

"Frederick C. Howe, a former Cleveland man and a prominent figure in social reform in New York, gave the moving picture theatres a slap in an article contributed to a Cleveland newspaper the past week. Mr. Howe is one of the advisory board of the national film censors, but it is evident that his duties do not bring him personally in touch with the recent production of the film makers. He writes upon city building and advocates a period of play after the working day for every man. He suggests that the men and women in the average American city have no place to seek amusement in the evening except the saloon, the dance hall and the picture theatre, and in classing the picture theatre as one of the unworthy amusements of the masses, is out of accord with many other reformers. Perhaps Mr. Howe refers especially to New York, but the criticism does not apply to Cleveland theatres, as Mr. Howe would know if he had made an investigation in his old town. A more competent estimate of the picture theatre came recently from City Censor Bartholemew, who finds Cleveland picture houses, as a rule, well conducted and the pictures of educational value. Cleveland folks have a wholesome amusement almost at their door, where, for five or ten cents, they may have realization in a clean comedy picture; a thrill in re-enacted historic battles or events of frontier life or receive "sugar-coated" education in the form of the photo-plays that teach something while they entertain."

MOVING PICTURES MAKING HISTORY

Preparations in Progress for the 1915 Panama-Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco Give Opportunities to the Camera Man

A pageant of moving color; waving banners and flying pennants; ambassadorial dignitaries, foreign potentates and plenipotentiaries; thousands of children garbed in the picturesque costume of some far-off land and carrying flags imprinted with the figures of 1915; the whole scene flooded with sunshine and set in a frame of natural beauty made by the blue ocean and the rolling hills of California!

What more could the moving picture man want? Yet such is the opportunity he gets almost every day at Harbor View—that narrow strip of land on the shores of the Pacific Ocean where there are now being erected the first buildings of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition to be held at San Francisco in 1915.

These pageants, which have become almost a daily event at San Francisco, usually accompany the selection of a site for the building of a commonwealth or foreign nation's pavilion on the exposition grounds. When it is remembered that twenty-seven states of the Union and seven foreign nations have already chosen their sites for the 1915 world's fair, and that each event is made the occasion for plenty of pomp and circumstance with the "bands all front and the colors spread" it will be seen that the "movies" man is a very busy person in San Francisco just at present.

And besides the pageants there is enough interesting activity going on in the construction departments of the exposition to keep the cinematograph crank turning. A huge palace—the Hall of Machinery—is gradually lifting its massive elevation more than a hundred feet from the ground and foundations for others of the fourteen exhibit buildings to be erected by the exposition company are being dug out. Hundreds of men are now employed on the grounds which cover an area of 625 acres. Scores of mule teams and puffing locomotives are incessantly hurrying and scurrying here and there while giant steam cranes, mounted on derricks eighty and ninety feet high, swing their long arms into space and reach down to snatch up lengths of lumber that go to make the walls of the immense palaces of the greatest exposition in history.

San Francisco is particularly adaptable for the taking of moving pictures. The air is clear and there is never a lack of brilliant sunshine all the year round. For panoramic work no situation could be better chosen than the hills and terraced streets that surround the exposition site. From the summit of Russian Hill, famous over the world as the artistic quarter of the western shores of America, where Robert Louis Stevenson, Bret Harte and Mark Twain once lived, a splendid view of the whole activities on the exposition site may be obtained. While from the water's edge the picture takes in the artistic setting of the city's residential section, which has grown splendidly out of the ashes of the disastrous fire of 1906.

Thousands of visitors congregate daily in and around the grounds that are now shaping themselves into what will be a garden of delight in 1915. And as a background to the scene of interesting activity that is presented on the site day in and day out, there are the ocean going liners and fishing boats, yachts and army transports that are ever crossing and recrossing the Golden Gate.

Thus, San Francisco at this time provides copious "copy" for the moving picture man. And that ubiquitous person is taking full advantage of it as may be seen from the films that are shown in all parts of the country depicting activities in the preparation for the world's record international exposition.

Never a day goes by in the city of San Francisco itself but what some of the many picture shows do not put on a film of exposition activities. As the exposition is in process of construction it follows that the scenes are never the same in any pictures. There is always something new, always something interesting to look upon.

The construction of a pile of beautiful buildings that will cover an area of 625 acres—work which has to be completed according to contract by the autumn of 1914—is naturally full of life and activity, and the pictures which are being taken daily of the work in its progress will make the most realistic and valid history that could be desired.

During the era of the exposition—from February 20 to December 4, 1915—moving pictures of events in the exposition will be taken every day, and will serve as a historical record of the doings at what will be the rendezvous of the world two years from now. It is the first time that the moving picture has played such a prominent part in world expositions and the fact of its importance marks an epoch in the story of the progress of civilization.

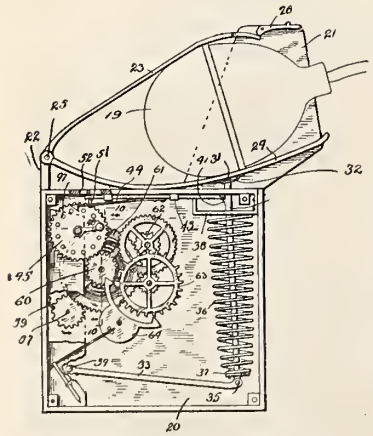
MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

A little knowledge is certainly a dangerous thing, especially as related to the stimulation and protection of inventions by adequate patent laws. Monkeying with the subject seems to be a favorite means of gaining notoriety for those not otherwise qualified to attract attention in Congress or elsewhere. The incongruities of the notorious Oldfield bill are illogical and absurd, but now comes the wise or otherwise Mr. Stephens, of Texas, with a proposition that caps the climax—nothing less than that citizens of foreign countries who apply for copyright registration or for letters patent in the United States shall pay the same fees and be subject to the same laws and regulations as those existing in the foreign countries in which they claim citizenship. Could anything be more simianitic? A resident of the United States but a subject of France, for instance, must pay royalties and work his patent according to the French law, administered primarily by the United States Patent Office, and secondly through the Federal Courts. Incidentally our United States Supreme Court, having more time than it knows what to do with, must study, interpret and enforce the patent laws and practice of all foreign countries. Our Patent Office, cramped for room and facilities, and lacking examiners, would be compelled to quadruple its labors, and a chaotic condition of affairs would pervade the whole system. Texans take out less than one per cent of patents granted citizens of the United States, and hence their political representatives are well qualified to throw light on the subject. Verily,

"Where ignorance is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise."

The professional is always more or less struck on himself, usually more than less, and here is a device that will enable him to take his own picture while posing confidently before his own private camera. The accompanying view is a sectional elevation of the device, called an automatic exposure attachment, patented by Harry M. Johnson, of Fresno, Cal., No. 1,060,259. The operation of the device is as follows: The operator depresses the lower bulb squeezing plate 24 and inserts the bulb as shown. The pin 48 is then engaged in that particular opening of the gear 45 which will permit of a predetermined lapse of time before the pin is rotated by the gear into engagement with the pull rod hook 44. The winding key is then actuated to wind the coil spring 56 and when released the spring immediately sets in motion the clockwork mechanism with a resultant rotation of the gear 45. The operator may then take position in front of the camera and when the predetermined time has elapsed a momentary squeezing of the bulb and actuation of the camera shutter will result automatically.



The Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, has appointed a committee on patents, trade-marks and copyrights, consisting of groups of individuals located at Washington, D. C., Rochester, N. Y., and Detroit, Mich.—the purpose being to have each group consider the subjects and reach its conclusion and correspond with the other groups to the end that the final reports instead of being sectional may be broad and national in character. The general offices of the Chamber of Commerce are in the Riggs Building, Washington, D. C.

In the case of the Standard Oil Company of New York, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia has, by Justice Van Orsdel, held that under the provisions of the Trade-mark Act of 1905, no appeal lies to said Court of Appeals from the decision of the Commissioner of Patents refusing to renew the registration of a trade-mark.

Pathe Freres, of Jersey City, N. J., and New York, N. Y., has been granted Registration No. 91,369 for moving picture films, having used same since October 30, 1911.

The object of Letters Patent No. 1,059,917 is to enable photographic positives to be obtained in all shades, by transformation of an ordinary silver positive into an anilin-monochrome. It is known that the metallic salts of various groups have the property of precipitating several anilin colors. Among these the most interesting are the chlorid, iodid, ferricyanid and chromate of silver, because it is easy to transform the reduced silver of photographs into any one of these compounds. The salts which forms the object of the present patent is iodid of silver. The positive, after being freed from hyposulfite, is plunged in a solution of bichlorid of copper. Soon after the image whitens by being transformed into chlorid of silver, or more probably into double chlorid of silver and of copper. If this first transformation was to be made into bromid of silver, the print would be immersed in a bromid at maximum concentration, such as ferric bromid, and if it was to be made into ferrocyanid, ferrocyanid of potassium would be used.

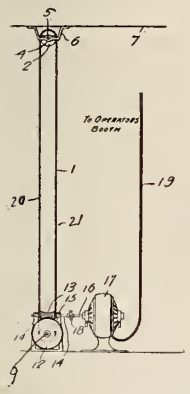
When transformation is complete the print is washed to free it from the reagent, then it is plunged in a weak solution of iodid of potassium. In this bath the color of the image, which was a brownish white, is changed to a greenish white, and the print is transformed into iodid of silver, or more probably into double iodid of silver and of copper, or of silver and of iron, or of silver and of potassium according to the reagent used in the first transformation. After this transformation of the image, immersion in a dye-bath follows. The best are: red of rosanilin or fuchsin, blue of methylene, or the blue known as blue 149, and ordinary auromon, for trichromes.

For by-color prints for stereoscopic projection, a mixture of fuchsin and auromin in predetermined proportions, and brilliant green or ethyl green, is preferred. The image of iodid of silver after being washed to eliminate iodid of potassium is plunged into the selected coloring solution.

According to one method the print is fixed in a bath of iodid of potassium. The iodid of silver is rendered completely transparent without disappearing. The monochrome therefore has all the purity of color which characterizes the anilin color without fading or diffusing, since iodid of silver is permanent. The second method is much more general and more perfect. The monochrome is plunged in a bath of tannin which precipitates all anilin colors without exception, and renders the color insoluble without affecting the iodid of silver. Two methods of fixing are available after the treatment with tannin, the hyposulfite of soda method, and the cyanid of potassium method.

This process is the invention of Auguste Jean Baptiste Tauleigne of Pontigny, and Elie Mazo, of Paris, France, who summarize the operations as follows: 1. Transformation of reduced silver into chlorid of silver by bichlorid of copper. 2. Transformation of chlorid of silver into iodid of silver by a weak bath of iodid of potassium. 3. Imbibition in a weak bath of a selected anilin color. 4. Washing the print in plain water or in acidulated water. 5. Fixing the color in a three per cent to ten per cent solution of tannin. 6. Elimination of the excess tannin by means of plain water. 7. Elimination of the silver salt by means of concentrated hyposulfite of soda or by cyanid of potassium of about ten per cent strength. 8. Elimination of the fixing reagent by a final washing.

"MOTION PICTURE" is the term by which the art is officially designated in the United States Patent Office. The art is placed in Division VII, Class 88, Optics, and has developed and grown to such proportions that it has been necessary to change the sub-classification, applications for patent for motion picture apparatus being now grouped and considered under the following specific titles, i.e., Color; Combined with Sound Producers; Multiplex; Optical Reflectors; Intermittent Feed, Film-beater type; Intermittent-grip type; Rotary; Intermittently-rotated Feed Drum; Geneva-gear type; Non-rewinding; Rotary Picture Disk; Shutters; Speed-control; Unconnected picture-plates; and Book Leaf type.



The utilization of the motion picture as an advertising medium is not looked upon with favor by the general public, and managers as a rule are wise to the fact. What might be designated as a double-faced screen, however, is a novelty patented by Paul E. Thomason, of Charlotte, N. C., No. 1,059,236, of which the accompanying view is a side elevation. The screen is an endless belt 1, supported by upper roller 2, and lower roller 3. The roller 2 is provided with pins 4 journaled in bearings 5 in brackets 6 on support 7. The lower roller 3 is journaled in brackets on the floor. A worm gear wheel 12 is secured to pin 9 and a worm 13 on a worm shaft 14 is in engagement therewith. The worm shaft is journaled in bearings 15 and is in alignment with the shaft 16 of an electric motor 17, and a clutch 18 is provided for connecting the shafts. 19 leads from motor to switch in the operating booth. The belt 1 is provided with a plain portion 20, and with a portion 21 for receiving advertisements or the like, and when the pictures are not being shown, the portion 21 is positioned in front of the audience.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

KINEMACOLOR AT CARNEGIE LYCEUM

With the news that the United States government is rushing the completion of the Panama Canal, so as to be prepared for possible complications with Japan over the California alien land legislation, comes the announcement of the closing weeks of the Panama Canal and Balkan War show at Carnegie Lyceum. These realistic natural-color scenes of the greatest constructive and destructive achievements of the age are now in their sixth month at New York's only subterranean theatre, but the demand for the show is such that it is necessary to start these films on tour to fill dates already booked in the first-class theatres throughout the country. The spectacle of Montenegro defying Austria has convinced people that the trouble in the Balkans is far from finished and aroused interest in the sturdy mountaineers who have the courage to face the Teutons as they have the Turks. The educational picture play entitled "Steam" has proved such a popular addition to the Carnegie program that it will probably be sent on tour before being released on general Kinemacolor service. This is a three-reel 'feature' film, and makes a very appropriate prologue to the Panama Canal scenes, showing as it does the development of steam power from the tea-kettle to the modern locomotive, with the life romances of James Watt and George Stephenson to supply human interest. There are two performances daily, including Sunday, at 3.30 and 8.30 P. M.

ITALA'S FEATURE FILMS POPULAR

The fallacy that feature films have strength insufficient for longer than one-night stands is destined for early and conclusive exposure. Stories of the experiences of exhibitors gleaned from the correspondence of the Itala Film Company of America establishes that big films that are big films will merit, by box-office certification, their worthiness of seven-day bookings.

Interesting is the experience of Chelius Bros. & Co., owners of the Bowen and Bessemer theatres in South Chicago. In these theatres Chelius in a year's time has shown nothing but feature productions, running these features from two to seven days, according to their merits. He showed the Itala feature "The Palace of Flames" for seven days, and, according to Chelius, the audiences broke all records. The public's comment on "The Palace of Flames" was that it was the greatest picture they had ever seen. Mr. Chelius has booked "Tigris" for a week's run.

This development of the feature film business is gratifying. It shows a strong tendency to get away from the fly-by-night attitude. Significant is the comparison between Greater New York, whose transient population alone is ten times greater, and the fixed population of South Chicago, in point of long bookings on films whose length rarely exceeds the maximum of four reels.

AMERICAN

THE GREAT HARMONY (May 17).—Old Von Berlitz lived in the little village with his daughter, Gretchen. He played the pipe organ at the church, loved it, and in quiet worked on plans for a new patented pipe organ. Gretchen worked in the grocery store.

The church committee, ever seeking a change, grew tired of Von Berlitz and discharged him, bringing from the city young Ziegfried, a handsome musician of note. Ziegfried called on the old man and felt mighty guilty of depriving him of support. Incidentally, he fell madly in love with Gretchen and began to visit the house regularly, bringing his own pupils for instruction. In spite of himself, the old musician began to love the younger man for his kindness.

One day Ziegfried called when Von Berlitz was working on his drawings of the new organ. Ziegfried became interested and finally took the drawings to the far-away city. Thus he did not appear for recital at the church, and the committee again visited the old Von Berlitz, this time to offer him his old place back again and to tell him that the young musician had run away with the drawings. Two weeks passed, and then three, and still the old man held his faith. Then came to Gretchen a telegram, which she read joyously to him. It said:

"American Organ Co. offers $10,000 for new patent. Will hold out for $15,000. Home soon. Ziegfried."

And home he came, with the check, and in return asked a gift he was willingly given—the hand of the more than happy Gretchen.

HER INNOCENT MARRIAGE (May 19).—Bessie married Bob Evans with her eyes shut. That is to say, Bessie loved an idol, a very perishable clay idol much addicted to the use of liquor.

Shortly after their marriage Bob came home reeling drunk. Bessie tried in vain to break him out, with the further use of the destructive poison, Bob fell into evil ways, returned home but seldom and then only to maltreat and abuse her.

A day came when Bessie could no longer stand the strain. So she packed her small belongings and dolefully went forth to seek new joys in new fields. Bob, coming home quite drunk, found the house locked and drifted away with the eddies of fate.

Tired, Bessie sat down upon a rock. Will Wayne, riding slowly down the road, saw her, stopped and, hearing her story, took her home. Old man Wayne and Will's mother kept her for several weeks and Will grew to love her dearly. But independent Bessie thought the time had come to leave and was only dissuaded by the urgent request of the whole family.

Two years late, Bessie found the morning paper on the stoop. Its first page contained the story of a railroad wreck, and among the slain was Bob. A year later Bessie married Will and the young couple moved to Will's new home and were happy. Riding through the mountains one day, Will came across Bob Evans, very much alive, quite sick and quite dirty. Not knowing him he took him home. Between Bob and Bessie there was instant trouble. Will started to interfere and a scuffle followed. Will dropped dead with a bullet through him. The cowboys then found the slayer creeping through the hills and ended a career that had wrecked the life and happiness of Bessie.

CALAMITY ANNE PARCEL POST (May 22).—Calamity Anne rose from her bed of straw in the barn and sighed dismally. Then she woke Woodrow, her pardner, the burro, and both sallied forth in search of adventure.

At the same time the Most Important Man in town rose and went to his place of business. He hung out his shingles one after the other. Some of them read "Sheriff," "Justice of the Peace," "General Store," "Physician and Surgeon," "Lawyer" and plain "Merchant" and "Postmaster."

That morning the Important One received official authority to hire a parcel post carrier. Who but Calamity, most popular person in Death Gulch.

Frightful experiences awaited Calamity. A negro baby from the Lord knows where must be delivered without address. Calamity forced it on the unhappy Important One, who rushed wildly home with it. A rooster formed another barrier to Calamity's happiness, for how can one lead a burro and a rooster, too? But better things awaited Calamity. The town had long been terrorized by the Meanest Man until a $1000 reward was offered for his capture. Now the Meanest Man was tired, and through the influence of Calamity's guardian angel he sought Calamity's own barn to rest. Then the rooster got away from Calamity and, with her madly after it, sought refuge in Calamity's haymow. Result—Calamity's gun was out and the Meanest Man in her care directly. With a rope around his leg, a rope around the chicken's leg, and a rope by which she led her burro, Calamity made her appearance before the boys and the sheriff.

And now that the Important One handed the $1000 to Calamity it became his fine aesthetic sense to hand the poor motherless negro baby to her. This he did and fled rapidly from the range of Calamity's six-shooter.

RED WINS (May 20).—Mr. Carter will not consent to the marriage of his daughter, Bernice, to Fred Warren, a reputable gambler. Marguerite, an adventuress, discovers Bernice's photograph on Fred's person, and immediately her jealousy is aroused.

Mr. Carter receives a letter from the detective agency which he had employed, informing him that Fred had gone to Ravisloe for the purpose of gambling. Mr. Carter takes Bernice to Ravisloe to find Fred gambling, and Marguerite, suspecting that Fred had gone with the Carters, determines to follow them.

Fred immediately tries his fortune at roulette, but, not wishing to be found gambling, he has Ernest, his friend, play for him, whom he instructs to stake everything on "red."

"I am only amusing myself here," is the explanation Mr. Carter gives Fred upon meeting him in the gambling rooms. While the game is in progress Fred wins at almost every turn of the wheel, and his conversation with Mr. Carter is so broken that it is apparent to the latter that Fred is more interested in the game. When at last Fred has won a considerable sum of money, Ernest says, "Take this money and tell Bernice that you are rich and wish to marry her." He promises her that he will never gamble again, and Bernice, with new faith in him, accepts.

Just as her father comes in, Marguerite tries to create a scene, but her utmost efforts go for naught. As the young couple leave they receive hearty congratulations and a fond farewell from the father.

A PERILOUS RIDE (May 22).—Nellie Merrill, a telegraph operator and station agent in charge of a small station at Lowery, Arizona, has plighted her troth to Tom, a young foreman of a nearby ranch, and the couple are looking forward to the time when Nellie can resign her position with the railroad and they can marry. Nellie's beauty, however, has attracted the attention of Senor Gazanga, an unscrupulous Mexican, who owns and manages a large copper mine just outside of Lowery. One day while he is annoying Nellie with his unwelcome attention, he goes a step too far, and her frightened cry for aid is heard by Tom, who happens to be outside of the station. The Mexican is quickly put to rout in a manner which he regards as humiliating, and he determines on revenge. Returning to his mine, he instructs his foreman to round up twenty-five or thirty of his companions whom he can trust, and they start out with the determination to abduct the pretty operator. In the meantime, Nellie happens to see one of Gazanga's scouts peering in at her through the window and, becoming alarmed, sends a note to Tom, telling him of her fears, requesting him to join her at the station, which he does. Gazanga's men approach the station and begin an attack. A thrilling battle ensues, continuing until the gallant defenders find their ammunition is running short, when Nellie, by a wonderful and unexpected means manages, to make her escape from the besieged building and return with aid in time to save the day.

GAUMONT

A PROBLEM IN REDUCTION (May 29).—Leander is worried about his appearance. He has too much of it. He fears that if he continues to grow east and west and back and forth he will resemble a crowd. When he has his picture taken he is charged for a group. He hears of an institute where they guarantee to triumph over triple chins, bay windows and slipped chests. One can lose almost any part of himself here, including part of his bankroll.

Leander's mysterious absences cause his wife, Lulu, to become jealous. She searches for evidence. She receives a telegram from him, saying that he can't come home for dinner that night, as he will have a business engagement. She finds in his desk a letter, signed "Madame Camille." It says that she will be delighted to see him and that she is always home at dinner time.

Lulu goes to the address marked on the letter. On being admitted, she sees her husband's hat, cane and overcoat on the rack. She is told by the maid that Madame Camille is now attending to a "yentleman" and is asked to wait her turn. Lulu persuades the maid to show her into the finishing room, wherein Leander is losing part of his personality. She is convulsed with laughter as she watches the masseur reduce the avoirdupois of his ample dimensions. Whereupon jealousy ends and 75 per cent of Leander returns to his 100 per cent of Lulu. There vanishes a great weight off his mind and also off her lap.

WHEN THE LEOPARD LAUGHED (June 3).—Mr. A. Gook writes to his friend Piffle, telling that he has crossed the Soudan on roller skates and an empty stomach. He adds that he is bringing a souvenir to Piffle, an angelic leopard, which is fed on gin and gorgonzola.

Gook arrives. The leopard looks like the spotted fever. It is an affectionate animal, and in its eagerness to show its esteem for the scenery, it licks the design off the carpet, the flowers off the china and the skin off the hands of the neighbors. It is not backward in com-

A MAN

Came to the Motion Picture Center this week and in a few hours purchased supplies which otherwise would have kept him running about New York for at least two days.

Another man, a novice, came here for advice and information and then purchased on our floor the equipment of an entire theatre.

Both men saved time and money. You can do the same—whether you buy much or little.

ing forward and makes such a fuss over visitors that they are not prone to stay long.

It is a happy household, until one day the leopard, smelling round a leopard rug, suddenly recognizes it to he that one which was formerly worn hy its mother. Large, salt tears run up and down the poor leopard's face as it recognizes what fate has hefallen its ma.

Feelings of vengeance suddenly enter its innocent heart. It chases the family around and then chases them hack again. They finally gain courage and turn on the heast. They overpower it and put it into a large hasket. Piffle sends it to his mother-in-law.

When the leopard is released hy the mother-in-law, it starts to muss up mother-in-law's features, hut mother-in-law has heen handling hushands all her life and is some "Old Scratch" herself. What she does to that leopard would hring tears to the eyes of a potato.

LOVE AND LAUNDRY.—This is a case of "Let George do it"—while you laugh at results.

It starts when George writes two letters—one to his sweetheart, calling for an answer tc a very important question when he calls later; the other to his laundress, who has heen casting sheep's-eyes at George while she ironed his shirts, calling her down for neglecting her duty. By mistake of the messenger, the letters get mixed and are delivered to the wrong persons. Not hearing from either, George decides to call on Bridget while on his way to get his sweetheart's answer.

You, of course, anticipate the reception he gets from Bridget, hecause she assumes that he is on an altogether different errand, and when he insists on talking ahout the shirt, she casts it aside, saying there are more important matters to take up. With this she throws her arms ahout his neck, and to say that George is amazed is to put it mildly. Pushing her away from him, he demands an explanation, when she flashes the miscarried letter. George tries to explain that it was not intended for her, hut she will not release him.

Bolting out with her still hanging ahout his neck, they run into the copper on the heat, who is appealed to hy hoth George and Bridget. The copper has heen casting sheep's-eyes at Bridget, and of course he decides in George's favor, so George is allowed to go his way, a little worse for the conflict.

Enter George into the presence of Mazie. Here more explanations are needed. However, George convinces Mazie that it was all an error, and is ahout to take her in his arms, when she pushes him hack, saying, "Oh, no, I may soil your white shirt front," hut George says, "I don't care," and, as you may imagine, there is hut one finish.

THE SAND MAN.—The opening scene shows a student poring over his hooks as the day closes. Enter the Sand Man, the inducer of sleep, who says: "The day is done, the time for rest is here." But the student replies: "No; I must work, work." Whereupon the Sand Man scatters the dust in his eyes and, as he dozes off, the Sand Man says: "Come with me and I will show you why I make my rounds so early."

The first place they enter is the kitchen of a workman's house. There sits a frail woman looking at the clock, as her hushand, a workingman, enters, drunk. The dutiful wife prepares the meal for her hushand and child, hut her solicitude meets with poor reward, for the hrute in the man asserts itself and, as he is ahout to strike the defenseless woman, the Sand Man scatters the dust and sleep comes to their rescue.

From here they go to the sick-hed of a child, where the Sand Man induces sleep—a panacea hetter than all else.

Next they visit the attic of a poor, struggling artist, who is ahout to seek sleep with drugs, when the Sand Man scatters his dust.
